INTRODUCTION

Iconography is the vidyā which explains the principles and the meaning of contemporary beliefs of the people as represented in the visual form. As a branch of study it also deals with the delineation of special features of the icons such as the āsanas, mudrās, bhaṅgimās, varṇas etc. As a handmade of religion Iconography guides and controls the religious art and determines the formal qualities as well. The increasingly developing religious beliefs together with the mythologies find their illustrations in art through the iconographic principles. In this respect, iconography is a language which translates the truth of religious dogmas into forms and provides them a meaningful existence. In the Indian context this branch of knowledge has developed a very intimate contact with the human beliefs—religious and psychological and has given forms to many such feelings and emotions, which are very common to life. It has also reacted quickly to the actions and inter-actions of religious behaviour of Indian people.

The data for the study of this subject has been provided by the literature and archaeology. The icons are found depicted on coins and seals and on the sculptures in stone, bronze, wood and clay. Even the inscriptions are useful for this study in the respects of indicating the antiquity of icons and in matters of identifications.

So far the literary sources are concerned, besides the general Indian literature, a vast material related to this branch of study is scattered in the ritualistic literature of the Āgamas, Tantras as well as in the Purāṇas. But the śilpa texts form the class by their own. They are really the results of the accumulated experience of generations of the śilpins. Most of the śilpins of the past have merged their individuality into the great system of accumulated vidyā of pratimā and have sanctified their knowledge by ascribing that to the mythical beings such as Matsya (in the Matsya Purāṇa), Hayagrīva (Agni Purāṇa), Mārkaṇḍeya (Viṣṇudharmottara Purāṇa) etc., to the Ṛṣis, such as Agastya (Agastyasakalādhikāra), Kaśyapa (Kāśyapaśilpa), Nārada (Nāradaśilpa), Nagnjit (Chitralakṣaṇa), Piśuna (Vāstuvidyā), Parāśara (Vāstuśāstra) and most noted among them, Viśvakarmā who has been credited with the authorship of Viśvakarmapaddhati, Viśvakarmaprakāśa, Viśvakarmaśāstra etc.

In the early mediaeval period this branch of knowledge appeared in the form of independent texts, foremost among them may be mentioned as Mānasāra (7th Cent.), Mayamata (8th Cent.), Samarāṅgaṇasūtradhāra of king Bhoja (11th Cent.), Abhilaṣitārthachintāmaṇi of Someśvaradeva III (12th Cent.), Aparājitpṛcchā of Bhuvanadeva (12th or 13th Cent.), Chaturvarga-chintāmaṇi of Hemādri (13th cent.), Rūpamaṇḍana and Devatāmūrtiprakaraṇa of Sūtradhāra Maṇḍana (early 16th Cent.), Śilparatna of Kumāra (late 16th cent.) etc.

In the long tradition of iconographic texts the Śrītattvanidhi of Śrī Mumuḍḍi Kṛṣṇa Rāja Oḍyāra, the king of Mysore of the late 19th century A. D. occupies an unique position for the reason that it presents the final summary of the iconographic knowledge on Śakti, Viṣṇu, Brahmā, Śiva and other minor gods and goddesses. The royal author is a compiler of the various dhyānas on gods and goddesses from various sources; from the Purāṇas to the Āgamas, from Tāntric kalpas to the local Māhātmyas; hence it has no less merit than those ancient works ascribed to the Ṛṣis. Thus, in the preface of the Śrītattvanidhi it is said :

'भिन्न भिन्न ग्रन्थेषु भिन्न भिन्न प्रकरणे उक्तानि तत्तदेवतालक्षणान्यत्र ग्रन्थे समानजातीयानां तत्तद्देवतादिलक्षणानामेकैकस्मिन्प्रकरणे सन्निवेशस्सम्पादितः। अत एवैतद्ग्रन्थोऽनेन महाराजेन कृतः महर्षिकृतमहानिबन्धवन्न महतां शिष्टानां परिग्रहाद्धीयते।'

The present study is confined to the first chapter of the text out of nine. The text of our study is based on as many as 35 ancient texts,[1] mostly rare and not easily available.

In the first chapter of this study the problem relating to the antiquity and history of the pre-historic Mother-Goddess cult along with her formal qualities as represented in art has been discussed. The Universal aspect of the Mother-Goddess cult has been studied both in terms of the geographical extensions as well as in the time scale. In the Indian context the study of the cult has been made on the basis of the terracotta traditions from the time of Harappans to the time of the Guptas. How the Mother Goddess cult has attained supremacy through the fusion and inter-actions of various cults, Vedic and non-Vedic, also has been noted.

The second chapter deals with the conceptual idealisation of the Mother principle on the basis of the Śākta beliefs and her relationship with her secondary forms has been critically analysed.

How the Ādiśakti assumes numerous forms such as under the traditional categories (Navadurgas, Ten Mahāvidyās, Pīṭheśvaries etc.) has been discussed in the third chapter.

The study of the iconography of the Mahiṣamardinī and the Saptamātṛkās forms the part of the fourth chapter. Their forms as known from the Texts and the tradtions, of the Indian imagery has been analysed and where possible, their symbolism and mythology has also been taken into the consideration for the present study.

The fifth chapter deals with the iconography of the patnis of the three gods—Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva.

In the sixth and the last chapter of the book an account of the Yoginis is given. No where else the Yoginis have received so much attention, particulary from the point of view of their iconography as known from her images and the literary accounts.

Though the present study is mainly based on the material from the Śaktinidhi of the Śrītattvanidhi a full use has been made of the vast iconographic material on the Śaktis found in the Purāṇas, the Śilpa and Āgamic Texts. How far the iconographic Śilpa Texts confirm or differ in the tradition of actual imagery is indicated with the help of 35 line drawings and with a number of photographs At the end, the relevant text of the Śrītattvanidhi is given.

I sincerely thank Prof. P. C. Chunder, the Union Education Minister, and Dr. N. R. Banerji, Director, National Museum, for encouragements in writing this book. I owe much to Sri B. D. Madhur for line-drawings and to Sri S. C. Ghildyal for the library assitance. I acknowledge courtesy of the Archaeological Survey, Govt. of India, for the photographs. Thanks are also due to Mss. Chaukhambha Orientalia for the publication of this book promptly. Finally, I apologise for the printing mistakes, which, unfortunately for me, have crept in, under the circumstances beyond my control. For that I depend upon the indulgence of the intelligent readers.

UNIVERSAL MOTHER

One of the earliest characterstics of human behaviour is the worship of Mother Goddess. The archaeological discoveries of Mother Goddess figurines throughout the areas of pre-historic world, essentially the Eastern Europe, Western Asia, Persia and India indicate that the cradle land of the Mother Goddess cult was in the Southern Russian Steppes and Western Asia.[1] From these lands the cult spread with wide influence in Eastern and Central Europe at the beginning of upper Palaeolithic times and gradually, probably simultaneously, the cult was introduced in the pre-historic communities of Iran and a little later in Baluchistan and Afghanistan. Not only that the Mother Goddess holds high antiquity, but it seems that SHE is the earliest manifestation of the divine principle to be represented in a visual form in bone, ivory, stone and bas-relief with the maternal organs grossly exaggerated with pendulous breasts, broad hips, rotund buttocks and excessive corpulency suggestive of pregnancy.[2] Thus, her iconographic forms were fixed and individualised and she got the status of an Ultimate Goddess or Universal Mother, responsible for giving life, vitality and prosperity as early as in the upper Palaeolithic times between fifth to third millennia B. C.

As a symbol of common culture, India and Iran shared the worship of Mother Goddess in third and second millennia B. C. At various centres of Iran, such as Elam and Susa a number of Mother Goddess figurines have been found. They are rude female figurines holding the breast, often adorned with bracelets, pendants and necklaces.[3] These figurines are Mesopotamian counterparts under various names. These goddesses were hailed as the goddesses of fertility and abundance. Sometimes they were invoked against the enemies also.

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

A large number of clay figurines representing females have been found at the pre- Chalcolithic and Chalcolithic sites in Baluchistan, Afghanistan and in the Indus valley. They are not play-toys. They represent cult goddesses. 'The uniformity of style, similarity of ornamentation and the wide area over which they were spread, forces the conclusion that these were religious figurines relating to cult worship of the goddess named variously such as Iris, Innini, Ishtar, Anahitā, Aditi etc. She is Earth Goddess. (Mahīmātā).[4] In the Vedic concept, as the goddess of Asuras she is Māyā and as the goddess of gods she is Aditi or Devamātā. This concept gained ground in the Purāṇic religion also.

The concept of Mahīmātā or the Earth Goddess[5] is primarily associated with the fertility aspect and motherhood. A number of female terracotta figurines show an infant at her breast or on the hip. Such figures representing the motherhood are the antecedents of 'Madona', the tradition of which continue far and beyond the Harappan cultures from the point of view of time and space. In the terracotta tradition of India, we find a large number of such figurines, holding child at various terracotta art centres of historical times.

The mother aspect of this goddess is variously represented in the terracotta art. Analysing the general features of the Indus valley, terracottas representing Mother Goddess may be summarised with Anand Coomarswamy as follows :[6]

(1) The nose is prominent, and formed by pinching up the clay together, so that it forms a projection continuous with the forehead.

(2) The eyes are large and round, and separately affixed.

(3) The lips are thick and separately affixed.

(4) Earrings are worn but are not very large.

(5) In some cases there is a choker-like necklace.

(6) The female figures wear a broad girdle, but are otherwise nude.

(7) The navel is generally indicated.

(8) The mount of Venus is not conspicuous.

(9) The breasts are not large, but are separately affixed.
(10) There are three kinds of head-dresses: fan-shaped,
(11) or with smooth lateral projections like horns which
(12) in one case are spirally twisted, forming a volute.
(13) The arms are held at the sides.
(14) as in one example, raised to the head.
(15) or as in another, the left arm is bent to support a child at the breast.

Some figurines from Harappa, represent the pregnant Mother Goddess with extended abdomen. Though their breasts are represented with pointed nipples, they appear to be full. Chanhudaro examples of pregnant Mother Goddess are like round pots with heads attached to them. The tradition of representing in clay the Mother Goddess as a pregnant woman is as old as Stone Age,[7] in the Aurignacian period. Several figurines from various pre-historic centres represent the theme of fertility, fecundity and motherhood. As fertility idols they are generally delineated with certain special features in which the essential central portion with the breasts, the belly, the sexual organs and the buttocks are always enlarged into a strongly modelled mass, while the arms (normally jointed in front) are small and frail. Such figures, commonly known as Venus, are most powerful and venerable images of women. Most famous among them are known as Venus of Willendorf, Menten, Lespungue, the Venus with horn from Lausell, Venus of Mazine etc. In the figurine of Venus of Willendorf conventional features of venus marked by little waist, no steatopygia, long and pendulous breasts, clearly marked nipples folded arms (occasionally) wide sexual triangle are carried to an extreme.[7]

These images certainly indicate that the earliest concept of divinity was mainly related to the form of mother creating and nourishing the world. Early hunters and food gatherers of pre-historic societies realised the significance of women in the process of food-production, pottery making, domestication and milking; therefore they deified the mother aspect of women and thus accepted the predominance of feminine principle (śakti).[8]

Another figure from Harappa showing the fertility aspect and pregnancy is represented on a seal. In this figurine a woman is represented with a plant coming out of her womb.[9]

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

As mother, though she is represented mostly as a benevolent goddess the reverse of some of the terracotta figurines from Kulli represent the terrifying skull like aspect, which according to V. S. Agrawala are the Mother Goddess like Kālī or Chaṇḍikā of later times.[10]

A horned figure from Mohenjodaro needs comparision with Venus with horns from Lausell, though iconographically they stand apart with each other.[11]

The aspect of nudity is noteworthy which is common not only to Indians and Sumerians but also to Aegean terracotta figurines. The prominent nose and thick lips of the Indus Valley terracottas are also similarly rendered as in the Sumerian Mother Goddess. Considering all these common features Glotz remarks that SHE the nude is the Great Mother. 'It is she who makes all nature bring forth. All existing things are emanations from her. She is the Madona, carrying the holy child, or watching over him. She is Mother of men and of animals too. She even makes the plants grow by universal fecundity, perpetuating the vegetative force of which she is the fountainhead.'[12]

The above mentioned conception about the Mother Goddess figurines of the Aegean pantheon is quite true to Indian nude terracotta goddess, particularly, because the Indian Mother Goddesses are really the nearest cognates of Anahitā and Ishtar. Coomaraswamy points that the Indian goddess Aditi has much in common with the Babylonian Ishtar and with Śrī Lakṣmī of the later pantheon. In each case, great stress is laid on the life giving quality of the goddess. He further says that the Indian nude goddess was a goddess of fertility and popular as a household goddess among the non-Āryan communities. But later she became absorbed in the Brahmanical and Buddhist pantheons as Śaktis and ultimately became identical with the Great Mother, the supreme Devi of the Tantras.[13]

The Āryans had in their pantheon various goddesses such as Prithivī, Aditi, Ushā, etc. As an instrusive element, the Āryan culture for a time stood apart from those who were the worshippers of phallus and yoni representing the generative organs to symbolise fertility. Of course, for this aspect of force Āryans had their own goddess Pṛthivīmātā, the Earth Goddess. Compared with Dyus, Pitar, Prithivīmātā personified the fundamental forces of fertility fecundity upon which all life depended. But gradually more powerful, at the same time popular, elements of Mother Goddess cult, as cherished by the Harappans, superseded and wrapped the Vedic concepts of fertility and abundance. The process of this kind of transformation was through the concept of duality. Thus, it was conceived that the Creator is both, male and female. As the androgynous Creator he has produced his own consort from the female side of his nature. Thus this Creator, a deity of dual nature, one quiescent and the other active, his female energy (śakti) usually was personified as his wife, inseparable from him and joining with him in creation, sustaining and destroying the phenomenal universe. In this way, as E. O. James points out, the worship of Mother Goddess received Brahmanical sanction by interpreting them as manifestations of Śakti personified in the aspect of consort. At a level śakti was interpreted as the eternal reproductive principle (prakriti) united with the eternal male principle (puruṣa) in the generation of the gods and the universe.[14]

The word 'Śakti' occurs more than a dozen times in the Rigveda and conveys the idea of powers of generation and fertilisation. Thus as the philosophical sense the idea of generation, meaning to give birth to the world of names and forms, played as important part in the post-Vedic connotation of 'Śakti' as the female creative principle fashioning the world out of her womb (sarvaprapancha janani).'[15]

The first and the foremost goddess of creativity is Vāk, conceived by the early Āryans as Mantra-Mother or Mātrikā Śakti. Her function is bestowing wealth and protection and looks in the association with Prajāpati. In the sublime concept Vāk pervades everything (RV. X. 125). Among other goddesses mentioned in the Rigveda are Ushā, Ilā, Sarasvati, Rākā, Sinivali, besides Aditi and Prithivi. Some of the above mentioned goddesses, though held with high esteem, could not, however attain the status of Great Mother or prime Mother Goddess. In most cases it is not possible to determine their anthropomorphic forms. It is, however, to be pointed out that the 'Rātrisūkta (V. X. 127) devoted to Vāk has special application to certain śākta ritual, it is only Aditi who comes nearest to the all-powerful Great Mother Goddess. According to the Rigvedic hymns she is whatever has been born and shall be born.[16]

In the later Vedic period the feminine energy as the spouse of god becomes more common and as the result of this process we find several names of the goddess, occuring in different texts. Thus, Ambikā, the sister of Rudra, occurs in the Vājasaneyī Saṁhitā (III. 57) and Taittirīya Brāhmaṇa (16. 10 5-5). In the Taittirīya Āraṇyak (X. 10. 7) Durgā, Vairochanī, Kātyāyinī and Kanyākumarī are mentioned. The Kena Upanishad (III. 25) refers to Umā, the daughter of Agni. Durgā is also described as the daughter of Agni and connected with the sacrificial fire. The names of seven Kālis as the seven tounges of Agni occur in the Muṇḍaka Upanishad (1. 2. 4). They are Kāli,

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

Karālī, Manojavā, Suiohitā, Sudhūmravarṇā, Sphulinginī and Visvaruchi. The Goddess under the names Bhadrakālī, Bhavānī and Durgā are referred to in the Sāṅkhyāna and Hiraṇyakeśingṛha Sūtras and in the Taiṭtirīya Āraṇyaka : [17]

Thus, by the end of the Vedic period it seems that some of the goddesses gained supremacy in the Vedic pantheon also. The epics also show the prominance of Mother Goddess, even as Universal Mother (jaganmātā or Jagadambā). There are two Durgāstotras in the Mahābhārata (IV. 6 and VI. 23), Harivaṁśa also includes one, renowned as Āryastava.

Though this recognizes Durgā, Āryā, Kauśikī, Kātyāyinī etc. as Āryan goddesses, essentially the worship of Mother Goddess belonged mostly to common folk and non-Āryan communities. The Āryastava assigns the worship of Āryā or Durgā to the Śabars, the Barbaras and the Pulindas. We have seen that the nudity aspect of the Mother Goddess was an universal feature of the Mother Goddess cult. This aspect is specially noticeable in the forms of Śabarī, Parṇaśatari, Nagna–śabrī, Aparṇā etc.[18] The association of the other goddess cult with the aborigines and non-Āryan communities is further testified by the festival of 'sabarotsava, celebration on the tenth night in the autumn season.[19]

The symbolic representation of Mother Goddess was also prevalent in the Harappan communities where the worship of yoni was also a practice. Certain objects discovered at Mohenjo-daro have their upper and lower surfaces undulating, while in some others the lower surface is flat but the upper one takes a quarter-foil form. These objects according to Marshall represent the yoni, the female organ of generation symbolising mother hood and fecundity.[20]

A ring-stone from Patna

A large number of ring-stones discovered from the historical sites from Taxilā to Pātaliputra, such as Mathurā, Rājghāt, Kauśāmbī signify the continuation of the tradition of symbolic worship of Mother Goddess. These ring-stones are of hard sandstone in black, violet or slate colour and are of flat discoidal form. with or without a hole in the centre and showing the Mother Goddess in various combinations or only having plural geometrical patterns. These ring-stones are the objects of worship of Mother Goddess to be associated with the popular belief, particularly of the non-Āryans.[21] Anthropomorphic representation of Vedic goddess is to be seen in the Lauriya Nandangarh gold repoussé representing a nude goddess found from a Vedic burial. This goddess, according to Coomarswamy, is the figure of Aditi, the Earth-Goddess.[22]

Repoussé gold plaque showing Earth Goddess from Lauriya Nandangarh.

The tradition of figuring Earth Goddess in clay was a prominent feature in Indian art of historical times. A large number of terracottas representing Mother Goddess and Earth Goddess have been found from Peshāwar, Taxilā, Mathurā etc. belonging to pre-Mauryan and Mauryan times. Most conspicuous iconographic features of these terracottas are the nudity, enormous breast and hips, position of arms to hold a child and the figures showing child sucking the breast of the Goddess. All these suggest that iconographically they are the representation of fertility goddess [23]

In the Śuṅga period, besides the change in the technical aspect, there is also a significant change in iconographic formulae of the terracotta tradition. On the technical aspect the moulding is preferred to appliqué. In iconography, two points of change are noteworthy. The aspect of nudity is subdued and the body of the fertility figures are much decked and concealed with ornaments and clothings. But, despite the clothing, particular care is taken (as is also the case in much of the Śunga and Early Kushāṇa stone sculptures) to show the details of the sex very clearly.[24] Coomarswamy compares these terracotta figures with contemporary sculptures and indicates that in these terracotta figures of fertility Goddesses, along with the figures of Mathurā rail pillars, the sexual parts are clearly shown as if to emphasise the source of fruitfulness.[25]

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

The other feature of the Śuṅga terracotta female figurines is that they for the first time present some iconographic types associated with the feminine principle in the forms of Śaktis or goddesses other than the traditional Mother Goddess alongwith the mithuna figures. Iconographic types of the Śuṅga terracotta art present the figures of Śrī Lakṣmī, Yakṣiṇis and Vasudhārā etc.[26] The contemporary sculptural tradition in stone also recognizes the mother and fertility principles alongwith some iconographic types such as Śrī Lakṣmī or Gaja-lakṣmī or Abhiśeka Lakṣmī etc. The general delineatory features are the same as non-iconographic terracotta tradition. Both the traditions give emphasis on the nudity aspect, determinately showing the sex organ, developed breasts and broad hips.

But a class of female terracotta figurines is of special interest. Such female figurines have, in place of the head, fully blossomed lotus with petals falling over the shoulders, alongwith other features of the Mother Goddess. Marshall identifies such figurines with the goddess Prithvi[27] and C.C. Dasgupta with the Mother Goddess.[28] I suggest the identification of such figurines with Śākambharī, the goddess of vegitation.

A class of terracottas known as ageless or timeless group from Kauśāmbī, Ghosi and from Bansi—a newly discovered site in the Basti Distt. by me, is also to be associated with the mother-cult. On the technical aspect they are prominent in appliqué or additive technique and there delineation is summary, particularly of hands, fingers and legs. Eyes, pupils, nose and lips in most cases are separately applied and hair, fingers etc., are shown by notches or incisions. Mother aspect in some cases are suggested only by their holding a child at the left. Otherwise the traditional features of Mother Goddess such as nudity, and the indication of sex organ is conscipicuous by its absence. But the most peculiar feature of the archaic or ageless terracottas of Bansi is the expression of face which is grim and quaint suggesting the awe-inspiring aspect of the goddess. The peculiar religious stamp over the faces of these figures is also noteworthy and so also their occassional association with the lotus. The lotus, particularly with long stem, is symbolic of fertility as well as of prosperity which are the two significant aspects of the Mother Goddess.

Though mithuna figure has a history in Indian art from the 3rd century B. C. to 13th century A. D., but in terracotta art, it seems, it begins in the Śuṅga period. In such figures the physical union of man and woman has been sublimated to the status of divine copulation of puruṣa and prakṛti.[29]

In the Kuṣāṇa art female as well as mother aspect of the goddess find popularity in the sculptural as well as in the terracotta art. The Mother Goddess figurines have been found in amazing numbers from Taxilā, Mathurā, Ahichchatrā, Kauśāmbī, Rājghāt, Bhita, Basarh, Besanagar, Ghosi, Pātaliputra and Bansi.

Kuṣāṇa female terracottas, when representing Mother Goddess, follow the features of early tradition, marked by absolute nudity, prominent breasts, deep navel-mark and determinately emphasized sex organ. They also show a realistic modelling.[30]

The crude and ageless types of terracottas depicting variously the Mother principle were also popular in the post-Gupta terracotta art. The excavations of Ahichchatrā have yielded several terracottas of this class from the post-Gupta levels.[31]

Purely iconographic types of terracotta figurines, though less in number, represent the aspects of Mother Goddess in more than one ways. Generally they follow the iconographic principles of the contemporary sculptural traditions in stone, but the delineation is entirely different. They are crude in the Kuṣāṇa period and refined in the Gupta period. They mostly depict the goddess as the consort of the Great God Śiva. Thus Śiva–Pārvatī type is very common in the Gupta period and such icons have been found from Kauśāmbī, Rājghāt, Rangamahal, Bhita etc. Pārvatī is also shown in one of the terracottas from Mathurā holding Skanda.[32] At Mathurā in the Kuṣāṇa period, Mother and Child group of terracottas continue to flourish. At Bhatihara (Vārāṇasī) also almost a life size image in clay has been found and published by me.[33] The image is broken, only the child portion is partly intact. The child is held by the Mother. The fingers of the woman are clearly shown at the side and the back of the child. Mathurā has presented Hāritī, supporting a child in her arms. A figure of Vasudhārā with her emblem of the fish pair and a vase of gold is remarkably depicted in the terracotta art of Mathurā.[34]

In the terracotta art of Mathurā of the Gupta period more iconographic types persist; remarkable among them is the figure depicting the goddess Mahiṣāsuramardinī or Kātyāyinī killing or vanquishing the demon Mahiṣāsura. The goddess is shown four armed and her pose is effortless. The demon is shown almost like a docile being.[35]

Another terracotta piece depicting Ardhanārīśvara from Mathurā is interesting. This belongs to Gupta period but such figures date early in stone sculptural tradition. Such figures indicate the fusion of the Śakti and the Śaiva cults (Dakṣhiṇamārga and Vāmamārga).[36]

The representation of various goddesses on coins and seals is an interesting testimony of the development of iconic features and the cult of Śakti. Durga Prasad has noted the relationship of some symbols on punch-marked coins with the Śakti cult. Allan and J. N. Banerjea prefer to identify female figures on the die struck and cast coins, particularly the Pañchāla, Mitra series with the goddess Śri, Lakṣhmī, Gaja-Lakṣmī, and Durgā. J. N. Banerjea also feels that the coins of the Kuṇinda, which represent stag alongwith the goddess standing on lotus and holding a lotus flower in her right hand represent Lakṣmī born in human and animal forms.[37]

On one of the coins of Azes, as Gardner describes, is a female deity holding in raised right hand a flower and stands on lotus. Besides her there is a lion. Gardner tentatively identifies her with Lakṣmī, but on the basis of the association of the goddess with a lion, J. N. Banerjea identifies the goddess with Simhavāhinī Durgā.[38] Similarly, the coins of Maus also represent same

Indian goddess probably Vaiśṇavī. The coinage of Huviṣka represents Umā (OMMO) the consort of Śiva.[39]

These examples are good testimony of the fact that by the time of Śakas, the worship of 'Śakti' was not confined to Indians only; it attracted the foreign tribes also.

The seals from Bhita, Rājghāt (Vārāṇaṣī) and Nālandā represent on the various goddesses such as Durgā, Lakṣmī, Gaja-Lakṣhmī, Sarasvatī and several Mātrikās, such as Vārāhī.[40]

How the cult of Mother attained supremacy among other gods and flourished in many forms under various names is a matter of interesting investigation. It seems that the fusion of prehistoric Mother Goddess tradition with the Vedic goddess tradition relating to Vāk and Sarasvatī is greatly responsible for the prominence of Śakti cult in the post-Vedic times. The identification of Rudra and Agni, the two Vedic gods, inaugurated the process of fusion of 'Śakti' and 'Śiva' (Rudra) cults. The seven fierce goddess such as Kālī, Karālā, Bhimā, Chaṇḍī, Chāmuṇḍā etc.[41] identified with the seven tongues of Agni, became associated with Śiva as the result of this fusion. All these goddesses represented the destructive, terrible, fierce and wrathful aspects of the energetic female (Śakti). The peaceful and benevolent aspect of the goddess was promoted through the identification of Vedic Vāk and Sarasvatī with the Mother Goddess. Vāk represented the power of wisdom and hence the goddess was called Vedamātā, Sarvavarṇā, Chhandasāma-mātā etc.[42] The Mother cult of pre-historic communities in her fertility aspect, emerged as the goddess Śri or Lakşmī and thus became popular as the goddess of oppulance and represented the goddess in her generous and benevolent aspects.

The development of some schoolistic philosophies, such as Sāṅkhya and Vedānta (Advaita aspect) also gave strength to the cause of promotion of Sakti cult. The idea of the Sāṅkhya that the puruṣa is by nature inactive and prakṛti active in the proximity of puruṣa and similarly the concept of Advaita Vedānta that Brahman becomes the creator only when associated with māyā, the eternal power (nitya Śakti) really emphasised the goddess in her energetic as well as illusionary aspects. This māyā is none other than prakṛti while the māyin is purusha. Alternatively in the theistic sectarian concept they became Śakti and Śiva.[43]

Śakti, the embodiment of power, wisdom and capacity thus became the Mother par excellence who is Mahā Lakṣmī. She as Durgā killed the demons, as Devī revealed the knowledge and as Yoganidrā sent all creations to sleep.[44]

Śakti is also embodiment of various virtues and abstract qualities such as Chetanā (consciousness), Buddhi (intelligence), Nidrā (sleep), Kshudhā (hunger), Chāyā (shadow), Śakti (energy), Tṛṣṇā (thirst), Kshānti, (patience), Jāti (power of generation), Lajjā (modesty), Śānti (peace), Śraddhā (faith), Kānti (beauty), Lakṣmī (prosperity), Vritti (livelihood), Smṛti (memory), Dayā (compassion), Tuṣti (contentment), Mātā (motherhood) Bhrānti (error, defection), Vyāpti (all pervasiveness), Chiti (mind) etc. All these are the metaphysical exposition and manifold manifestations of the one Energy.[45] This concept of the Devī Māhātmya greatly enhanced the prestige of the Great Mother and established her superiority over other gods and goddessess. In this text the Great Goddess has variously eulogised in the terms of Ultimate[46] or Universal Mother (jagan-mātā or Jananimparā). This Supreme Mother (jananimparā) in the Devī Māhātmya (I. 55) is no other than the Universal Nature.[47] She is symbolised as the Earth (mahīsvarupā, XI. 4) which represents the great principle of Universal Motherhood and fertility not only for the world visible to our eyes, but also as the Mother of the whole creation (mātarjagatoakhilasya XI. 2) the only support of the world (ādhāra-bhūtā jagatstvamekā XI. 3) etc. Ultimately she has been invoked as one who among all created beings stands firm in the form of Mother.

SHE
IN HER PRIMARY AND SECONDARY FORMS

SHE, the Universal Mother is sometimes manifest and sometimes unmanifest; sometimes active and sometimes inactive. When unmanifest and inactive she is guptarūpī Durgā. In that capacity she is the perennial source of life in this world. The animate and inanimate is created out of HER.[1] She is the supreme power over all. In this form she is also described as Mahāmāyā (Great illusion) or Yoganidrā. She as Mahāmayā is described as follows :

"She is eternal having the universe as Her form. All these worlds are Her manifestations. Even so, She is incarnating in many fold ways. When She becomes incarnate for fulfilling the divine purpose, She is said to be born in the world, though She is eternal.[2]

Brahmā prays her saying, 'This universe is upheld by you. The world is created by you and the creation is protected by you. Oh Goddess ! at the end of the time you also consume it. In creation you are the creative force. In its maintenance you are the protective power. In its dissolution you are the destructive power—thus the totality of the world-form is thyself. You are the primordial prakṛti which brings into force the triple guṇas.[3] She is further invoked as the soul of everything ! Whatever or wherever anything exists the power of all that is yourself. You are the creator of all gods, even of Brahmā, the creator, Viṣṇu, the protector and Śiva, the destroyer. They all are your manifestation.[4]

Again the Ṛṣi Mārkaṇḍeya praises her as the eternal goddess who constitutes the energy of creation, permanence and the destruction, the abode of the guṇas (sat, rajas, and tamas). Brahmā in the Devī Māhātmya describes her as the primordial prākṛti which brings into force the triple guṇas. She, although eternal, incarnates again and again and protects the world.[5]

The mystery of 'Her' manifestations is fully explained in the Prādhānika Rahasya and Vaikṛtika Rahasya.

The triguṇamayī Mahālakṣmī who is manifest as well as un-manifest is the primordial energy (ādiśakti) pervading the Brahmāṇḍa. This primary goddess Mahālakṣmī assumes various forms of pacific and terrific characters.[6] In her concrete form this Mahālakṣmī is a four armed deity holding a citrus (mātuliṅga), a mace (gadā), a shield, (kheṭa) and a cup (pānapātra). Over her head she bears nāga, liṅga and yoni. She is of golden colour.[7]

The primary goddess thus conceived, is variously described in different texts In the Rūpamaṇḍana and Aparājitapṛcchā Mahālakṣmī is described as follows :

One of the hands of the devī should be in the boon-bestowing pose (vara) and the rest three should show a trident (triśula), a shield, (kheṭaka) and a cup (pānapātra).[8] Thus, the Rūpmaṇḍana does not recommend citrus and mace, which is suggested in the Prādhānika Rahasya. According to the Rūpamaṇḍana and Aparājitapṛchā the Primary Goddess Mahālakṣmī should also show Śiva and Nāga (nīlakaṇthatathānāgam) over her head. In the Prādhānika Rahasya as noted above it is said that she should hold on the head nāga, liṅga and yoni In the Vaikṛtika Rahasya it is recommended that one of the hands of the goddess should show śṛphala instead the mātuliṅga.

In the Śritattvanidhi the Goddess Mahālakṣmī is described as of coral colour and has eighteen hands. In these hands she holds a rosary, (akṣa) the śruka, an axe (paraśu), a club (gadā), a thunderbolt (kuliśa), a lotus (padma), a bow (dhanu), the kundikā, a staff (daṇḍa), a spear (śakti), a sword (asi), a shield (charma), a lotus (jalaja), a bell (ghaṇṭā), a cup (surābhājana), a trident (śūla), a noose (pāśa), a disc (sudarshan chakra) S. T. 4.

This account of the goddess is in accordance with the Haṇḍikalpa which adds that she should be shown standing on the lotus. The Vaikṛtika Rahasya confirms this description of Mahālakṣmī so far as the number of hands are concerned, but there is difference in the description of the weapons in the hands. The hands of the goddess according to this text should show a rosary (akṣmālā), a lotus (kamala), an arrow (bāṇa), a sword (khaḍga), a thunderbolt (vajra), a mace (gadā), a discus (chakra), a trident (triśula), an axe (paraśu), a conch (śaṅkha), a bell (ghaṇṭā), a noose (pāśa), a spear (śakti), a staff (daṇḍa), a shield (charma), a bow (dhanuṣa) and a kamaṇḍlu. She takes her seat on the lotus and in her, all the goddesses take their abode (sarvadevamayī) [9]

It is to be pointed out that in the earliest part of the Devī Māhātmya as Yoganidrā she is conceived as a ten armed goddess of which nine show a sword, a spear, a club, a disc, a conch, a bow, the arrows, a sling and a mace. As only nine āyudhas are enumerated, either she shows one of the hands in the varada pose or she with one hand is engaged in attacking the demons Madhu and Kaitabha.[10]

The manifested form of the Mahālakṣmī includes one of her primary forms also.

This manifested form of the Mahālakṣmī retains the same name and characteristics as of primary Mahālakṣmī in her secondary form also. This form of the goddess represents the rajoguṇa. The sata and tamas aspects of the great goddess Mahālakṣmī are manifested as Mahākālī and Mahāsarsvatī,[11]

Mahākālī in whom the tamoguṇa predominates, is four armed goddess and of blue colour (añjana). She is very terrific in form and is decorated with skull-garland. She holds a sword (khaḍga) a cup, (pātra), skull (śira) and a shield (kheṭaka). She has big and bulging eyes and protruding teeth. On her bust she holds a corpse (kabandha).[12]

The primary goddess Mahālakṣmī when assumes secondary form as Mahākālī is also known as Mahāmāyā, Kṣudhā, Tṛṣṇā. Nidrā, Ekavīrā, Kālarātrī and Duratyā.[13]

In the Viṣṇudharmottara Purāṇa the goddess Mahākālī is described similarly. But here she is said to have only eight hands. As an eight handed goddess, according to Karṇāgam she should be shown with a conch (śaṅkha), a disc (chakra), a club (gadā), a pot (kumbha), a pestle (mūsala) and an elephant goad (aṅkuśa), a noose (pāśa) and a thunderbolt (vajra).[14]

In the Śrītattvanidhi it is recommended that the goddess Mahākālī should be shown with eight hands, holding in them a sword (khaḍga), a disc (chakra), a mace (gadā), a bow (chāpa), an iron rod (parigha), a spear (śula), a sliṅg (musudi), a head (śira) and a conch (śaṅkha). Her colour is described as of smoke or black resembling the colour of cloud. She is described as three eyed and her whole body is decked with ornaments. S. T. 3.

As the general feature of the goddess. it is said that she has distended eyesand has thin waist (viśhālalochanānārī babhaūva tanu madhyamā).

In this form, according to the Śrītattavanidhi she is the slayer of Madhu and Kaitabha.

Mahākālī in the tāntrika concept is superior to Kāla which represents the destructive power (jagatsamhārakāraka).[15] She as Kālī absorbs even the evil forces of the Kāla. For everything she is the primary force.[16]

In the Mahānirvāṇa Tantra (5. 140) Kālikā, who is arūpa (un-manifest) is known as the mother of the Kāla. She assumes forms according to her respective guṇas (primeval element) as kriyā (the action), i.e. for actions of the destruction she needs tamoguṇa and is of black colour. When she is inclined to create, she is of red colour and embodies rajoguṇa. While preserving she assumes the colour of white and represents satoguṇa.[17]

It is to be pointed out that in the Vaikṛtika Rahasya Mahākālī is also described as the Yoganidrā of Viṣṇu and the abode of tamoguṇa. Pressed by Brahmā she took the form of Mahākālī to kill Madhu and Kaitabha. She has ten faces, ten arms, ten legs and thirty eyes. Her complexion is black like añjanā.[18] In her hands she holds a sword, arrows, a club, a spear, a disc, a conch, a mace, a sling, a bow (kārmuka) and a head from which the blood falls drop by drop.[19]

This axtra-ordinary form of Mahākālī has partial resemblance with the description of Yogamāyā given in the Devī Māhātmya. Here though the goddess is described as having ten legs or ten faces or thirty eyes, the weapons she has in her hands are a sword, a spear, a club, a disc, a conch, a bow, the arrows, a sling and a mace. Her face is terrible (ghora). As only nine weapons are enumerated and hands are ten, possibly she holds arrows in two hands, as she shows club and mace, in the other two hands.[20] Yoganidrā in the Viṣṇudharmottara has altogether a different description. According to this text she is to be shown in the reclining pose on the couch. She has two hands and in one of the hands she has a cup (pānapātra).[21]

In the Śrītattvanidhi the image of Yoganidrā is described almost in the similar way. She is said to be of black complexion and her two hands hold a noose (pāśa) and a cup (pātra) [S. T. 34].

As Mahākālī she exercises control over Brahmā at the times of creation and brings world into existence. At the time of pralaya, the universal destruction, she is Mahāmārī. She, at the time of preservation, is Lakṣmī the bestower of wealth as well as Alakṣmī or Jeyeṣṭhā the destroyer of wealth.[22]

The satoguṇa of Mahālakṣmī has manifested in the form of Mahāsarasvatī. She is of white complexion and has four hands. In them she shows a rosary (akṣamālā), a goad (aṅkuśa), a lyre (vīṇā) and a book (pustaka).[23] She is named variously by the great goddess Mahālakṣmī. Thus she is known as Mahāvidyā, Mahāvāṇī, Bhāratī, Vāk, Sarasvatī, Āryā, Brāhmī, Kāmadhenu, Vedagarbhā, Dhīśvarī etc.[24]

As Mahāsarasvatī she is described as the most beautiful of all beauties and exceedingly good-looking.

In the Vaikṛtika Rahasya she is described as an eight armed goddess holding an arrow, a spear, a disc, a conch, a bell, a ploughshare (lāṅgala) and a bow named kārmuka.[25]

She is said to have born from Gauri (Gaurīdehātsamudbhutā). The same is the description of her in the Śrītattvanidhi. In this text she is described as holding a bell, a spear, a plough, a conch, a pestle, a disc, a bow, an arrow in her eight hands. She does not show the book in any of her hands. This goddess is a slayer of Śumbha S. T. S.

In the Uttara Charita of the Devī Māhātmya, however this goddess is said to have fought with Śumbha as Ambikā and not as Mahāsarasvatī.[26]

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Preservation Foundation, Chandigarh

In the Devī Māhātmya it is said that when Śumbha charged her that she is fighting under the strength of others the Devī explained her mystery to him by saying that 'I am all alone in the world here. All these goddesses fighting for me are my own powers. Upon this all the Mātrikās entered her person, which was just the form of Ambikā.[27]

Further, the goddess explained, 'Through my power I stood here in any forms; all that has been withdrawn by me and now I stand alone.[28]

The form of this Ambikā is not described in the Śritattvanidhi; but in the Lakṣaṇa Samuchaya she is described as seated upon a lion. She has three eyes (trayākṣā). She is adorned by a number ornaments, Her four hands hold a mirror, a sword and a shield. Her one of the right hands is held in the varada pose.[29]

Thus, the great goddess Mahālakṣmī assuming to secondary forms (Mahākālī and Mahālakṣmī) and retaining one primary form (as Mahālakṣmī or Lakṣmī) helps the creation, protection and destruction of the universe. But they alone do not come into action. All these three goddesses divide their persons into two halves; one male and the other female. As female aspect they retain the same name and the similar charactertistics. As male aspects, Mahālakṣmī created Viṣṇu as her male counterpart. So also Mahākālī and Mahāsarasvatī created Śiva and Brahmā out of them as their male counter parts. This they did under the instruction of the primary goddess Mahālakṣmī.[30]

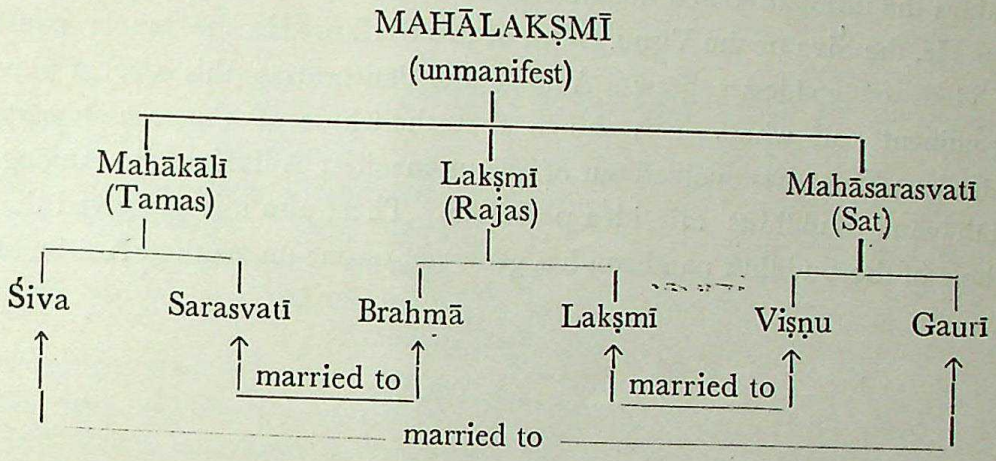
The symbolism of this becoming may be explained as follows : It is the eternal principles of formlessness which assumed forms of male and of female. Both are one and the same. He is Deva as well as Devī. This imagination fully corresponds to the concept of tvam strī tvam pumān of the Vedic metaphysics.[31]

The Vaikṛtika Rahasya explains the principle of their union with their male counterparts with reference to their actions for this universe.

Thus Mahākālī manifested into two Śiva and Sarasvatī, Mahālakṣmī created Brahmā and Lakṣmī and Mahāsarasvatī produced Viṣṇu and Gaurī. All these gods and goddesses came into action forming their union with their male counterparts. Their respective unions were according to this order. Lakṣmī married to Viṣṇu, Gaurī to Śiva and Sarasvatī to Brahmā.

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

The whole sequence of one becoming into many is explained as follows :



Brahmā and Sarasvatī create the universe, Viṣṇu and Sarasvatī preserve it and Śiva and Gaurī are engaged in the act of destruction.

The forms of Mahālakṣmī, Mahākālī and Mahāsarasvatī having eighteen, ten and eight hands, described above have significant place in the Samiṣṭa pūjā. In this form of worship the three goddesses having four hands, (prādhānika mūrtis), are worshipped alongwith eighteen handed Mahālakṣmī, ten handed Mahākālī and eight handed Mahāsarasvatī in the forms of Vaikṛtika mūrtis. In this composition, Gaurī and Śiva, Viṣṇu and Lakṣmī, Brahmā and Sarasvatī also had their place. Their situation in the Samiṣṭa pūjā are explained in the following diagram :--

Śiva-Gaurī	Brahmā-Sarasvatī	Viṣṇu-lakṣmī
4 armed Mahākālī	4 armed Mahā Lakṣmī	4 armed Mahā Sarasvatī
10 armed 10 faced Mahākālī	18 armed Mahā Lakṣmī	8 armed Mahā Sarasvatī

The above account suggesting the supermacy of one Mahālakṣmī over all other gods and goddesses is not an original concept in the Śakti worship.

The theistic secterianism which grew fast after the Kuṣāṇa period in India created a tendency among the upāsakas to conceive their upāsya as infinite and ultimate god analogous to the Vedic concept of Brhman from whom all other elements—divine or human or material take their origin. Thus, for the Śāktas the ultimate source was SHE and for the other sects—Śaiva or Vaiṣṇava was He, the Śiva or the Viṣṇu. Out of this SHE or He the whole pantheon of Gods or goddesses grew. Among the Pānchrātras, this concept played a prominent roll where it is shown that the whole of chaturvimsati mūrtis of Vāsudeva-Kṛṣṇa has evolved out of one un-manifest Ādikeśava.[32] Among the Māhāyāna Buddhists this idea prevailed. There also it is conceived that the whole of the Buddhist pantheon has grew out of one un-manifest Ādi Buddha.[33]

SHE–THE DURGĀ FROM ONE TO THE MANY

Durgā is one who is 'Beyond the reach'[1]. But in other explanations she is one, who destroys difficulty and affliction[2] and also removes the terror. In this context she has been described as assuming many forms out of one, besides the emanatory forms, which comesforth out of the Ādiśakti Mahālakṣmī, discussed above. It is also to be observed that the various names given by Mahālakṣmī to her various emanatory forms are not mere synonyms. They in due course adopted different forms, character and attributes. The theory of incarnations also has influence in the course of development of Śakti pantheon. Thus, we find a number of incarnatory forms of the goddess. Then there were the concept of collective goddesses, which presented a number of goddess-forms in groups, such as Navadurgā, Saptamātā, Ṣaḍgaurī, Ten Mahāvidyā, Chakradevī, Aṅgadevī, Pīṭheśvarī etc.

In the Śritattvanidhi these groups are not fully described. Chakradevis and Aṅgadevis are summarily mentioned while the important group of goddess namely Ṣaḍgaurī is ingnored[3]. There is no apparant discussion on the Śāktapīthas or Pīṭheśvaries, as the collective goddesses. But nearly two dozens Pīṭheśvaries as separate Durgās are described in the Śritattvanidhi. It is interesting that Śritattvanidhi presents two lists of Navadurgās.

First we take the account of incarnatory forms of the goddess.

The goddess herself explains the mystery of her incarnatory forms which is in accordance of the respective yugas. She says 'whenever trouble shall arise on accounts of the Dānavas I shall become incarnate and destroy the enemies.' Thus she says that to destroy Śumbha and Niśumbha in the 28 yuga of Vaivasvat Manu she will be born of the womb of Yaśodā in the house of the King

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

Nanda and will be named as Nandā and will reside at Vindhya mountain. Her name would also be Vindhyavāsinī Durgā. Then again to kill the descendants of Vipracitta she will be known as Raktadantā, a form of Chāmuṇḍā. Next, when there would be no rain, no water for hundred years, she will appear as Śātākṣī to be looked by Munis with a hundred eyes. At that time she will support the whole world with life sustaining vegetables, born out of her body. Then she will be known as Śākambharī. She will have the celebrated name Durgā when she will kill the demon named Durgama. She assuming the huge form (Bhīmarūpā) at the mountain of Himachala protected the munis, therefore she became famous as Bhimādevī. Lastly she killed the great asura Aruṇa causing great havoc in the three worlds by taking a bee like form comprising innumerable bees hence shall be praised by the people under the name Bhrāmarī.[4]

In some of the Tāntric texts she has been conceived as many according to her different ages. Thus when she is one year age she is Sandhyā, when two years old, she is Sarasvatī, when seven years old she is Chaṇḍikā; when eight years old she is Śāmbhavī, when nine, she is Durgā or Bālā, when of ten, she is Gaurī, when of thirteen, she is Mahālakṣmī, and when of sixteen years old she is worshipped as Lalitā.[4]

NAVA DURGĀ

Besides the incarnatory forms of the goddess Śritattvanidhi gives special stress on the iconography of Navadurgā. As stated above, this text presents two lists of Navadurgā.

The first list is traditional one. It includes the names of Śailaputrī, Brahmachāriṇī, Chandakhaṇḍā, Skandadurgā, Kuṣmāṇḍā, Kātyāyinī, Kālarātrī, Mahāgaurī and Siddhidāyinī. If this list is compared with Devī Kavacham there are two variations. One that the third devī is generally known as Chandraghaṇṭā rather than Chandrakhaṇḍā. And the other, that while Skandā or Skandamātā occupies the forth place in the Śritattvanidhi, it has the fifth place in the Devī Kavacham.[5]

The iconography of these goddesses are described in the Śritattvanidhi on the basis of a number of Śaivāgamas Thus it is said that all these nine Durgās are black in complexion. (sarveṣām syāmavarṇaḥ).

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

Śailaputrī, the first of the list wears the crescent (ardhachandra) on the forehead and shows two hands holding a trident (śula) in one of the hands. Her mount is bull. (S. T. 51)

Brahmachāriṇī is the second Durgā and has four hands. She holds lotuses (padma) in two hands and in the rest of the two hands she has a rosary (akṣamālā) and a water pot (kamaṇḍalu) (S. T. 52).

In some description she is a two armed goddess holding a rosary and a water pot.[6]

The third Durgā, Chandrakhaṇḍā or Chandraghaṇṭā has the mount, a kite. Her hands and emblems are not described in the Text. But it is said that she is of angry look. (S. T. 53)

The forth Durgā is Skandadurgā or Skandamātā, who always bestows the good fortune, mounts on a lion and shows lotuses in her two hands (S. T. 54).

Kuṣmāṇḍā Durgā or Kusmāṇḍī has in two hands a pūrṇa Kalaśa[7] full of wine and a lotus. She is wet with the blood (rudhirāmplut) (S. T. 55).

Kātyāyinī the sixth of the list is the destroyer of demons (dānavas), bestower of good fortune (śubham), and mounts the lion. She holds her sword (Chandrahāsa) drawn to kill the demon. (S. T. 56)

Kātyāyinī is same as Mahiṣamardīnī as well as Chaṇḍeśvarī of the Śritattvanidhi. The description of these goddesses will be discussed in detail elsewhere.

No specific detail is given in the text of Śritattvanidhi about Kālarātrī. She is a goddess of fearful look and has grim face. She is of black complexion. Elsewhere in the same text (S. T. 130), She has been described as having a single braid of hair. She has Japākusuma as her ear-ornament. She is naked and rides on ass. Her lips are hanging. She is bathed in oil. In her hands she holds a human head severed from the body. In her legs she has the of metallic wire.[8]

In the Mūrti Rahasya the goddess Kālrātrī is said to be the same as Bhīmā, who holds a sword, a cattledrum, a head and a drinking pot. Her colour is black.[9]

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

Mahāgaurī the giver of pleasure to Mahādeva Śiva is the bestower of good fortune. Her garments are white and she rides on a white elephant. Her emblems in the hands are not mentioned in the Śritattvanidhi. (S. T. 58)

The goddess Siddhīdāyinī Durgā, the ninth of the list is described here as served by the Siddhas, Gandharvas, Yakṣas etc. Her iconographic features are not known from Śritattvanidhi (S. T. 59).

The next list in the Text (S. T. 60) does not describe the individual features of the various goddesses. No where else also the description is available. But on the basis of Skandyāmala— an Āgamic text, these goddesses are described as decked with various ornaments and are named as Rudra-chaṇḍā, Prachaṇḍā Chaṇḍogrā, Chaṇḍanāyikā, Chaṇḍā, Chaṇḍāyanī, Chaṇḍarūpā, Atichaṇḍī and Ugrachaṇḍikā. The central goddess Chaṇḍī occupies her place in the middle flanked by four each on the either sides–all seated on the lotuses. Chaṇḍi is described as of the colour of fire (pāvaka) having eighteen hands. One of the left hands is in the tarjanī pose, rest show tuft of hair of the demon (mūrdhajam), shield (kheṭaka), a bell (ghaṇṭā), a mirror (darpaṇa), a bow (dhanuṣa), a flag (dhvaja), a cattledrum (damaru), a noose (pāśa). The right hands hold a spear (sakti), a mace (mudgara), a trident (śula), a thunder bolt (vajra), a conch (saṅkha), (śalākā), a (mārjanī) and discus (chakra).

Durgā from Mahābalipuram

According to T. A. C. Rao the goddess holds in her right hands aṅkuśa and cane instead collyrium stick (śalākā) and a broom (mārjanī).

Rest of the Devis have sixteen hands. The emblems of the hands are not mentioned. But their colour is of añjana in the case of Rudra Chaṇḍā, black in the case of Prachaṇḍā, blue in the case of Chaṇḍanāyikā, smoke (dhūmikā)

in the case of Chaṇḍāvatī, yellow (pīta) in the case of Chaṇḍarūpa, the colour of Champā in the case of Atichaṇḍī, the colour of turmeric, in the case of Ugrachaṇḍā.[10]

H. K. Sastri adds that they are generally shown standing naked with one leg placed on the head of the buffalo-demon and hold in their fist a tuft of the giants hair.[11]

One of the Durgā with sixteen arms called Ṣoḍaśabhuja–Durgā has three eyes and serpent jewellery and holds tridents in all her sixteen arms. (S. T. 61).

Though Navadurgā receives high respect among the Hindus, their imagers are not very common.[12]

T. A. G. Rao furnishes another list of Navadurgās on the basis of certain Āgamas. Their names are Nīlakaṇṭhī, Kṣemaṅkarī, Harasiddhi, Rudrāmśa-durgā, Vanadurgā, Agnidurgā, Jayadurgā, Vindhyavāsīdurgā and Ripumari-durgā.

Of these, some of the goddesses are described in the Sritattvanidhi. There is no mention of Nīlakaṇṭhī, Kṣemaṅkarī and Harasiddhī. Rao describes them as follows :—

Nīlakaṇṭhī is the bestower of wealth and happiness on her devotees and is to be shown as carrying in three out of her four hands a trident (triśūla), a shield (kheṭaka) and a drinking vessel, while the remaining hand is required to be kept in the varada pose.

Kṣemaṅkarī, the goddess capable of giving health, should keep one of her hands in the varada pose and the remaining three should be shown as carrying a trident (triśūla), a lotus (padma) and a drinking vessel.

Harasiddhi is the goddess who fullfils the desire of her votaries; she should carry in her hands the kettle-drum (damaru), a kamaṇḍalu, a sword (khaḍga) and a drinking vessel.

But for all other goddesses of the above mentioned list we have description in the Śritattvanidhi.

Thus, Rudrāmśadurgā is described as having two eyes and four hands holding a trident (śūla) and a sword (khaṅga), conch (śaṅkha) and a disc (chakra). She is of black complexion but wears red garb. Over her head

she has a kirīṭamukuṭa. Her body is decked by the ornaments of gold and rubby. Her vehicle is lion. Sun and the moon is also shown at the either sides of her image (S. T. 62).

Vanadurgā is an eight armed deity holding a sword (asi), a conch (śaṅkha), a sword (kṛpāṇa), a sheith (kheṭa), an arrow (bāṇa), a bow (dhanuṣa), a trident (śūla) in her seven hands while the eighth hand shows the tarjanī pose. Her colour is green like grass (dūrvā). It is to be pointed out that in some other texts she is said to have the golden colour (hemavarṇā) (S. T. 64).

T. A. G. Rao describes the goddess Vanadurgā on the basis of the same source as of the Śritattvanidhi. But the description does not tally with the text. According to Rao the goddess Vanadurgā should be shown as holding a conch (śaṅkha), a disc (chakra), a sword (khaḍga), a shield (kheṭaka), the arrow (bāna), a low (dhanuṣa) and a trident (śūla), and the remaining hand should show the tarjani pose.[14]

This goddess rides on a mahiṣa.

In the Śritattvanidhi a goddess named as Vana-śankari is also mentioned. It is not possible to show any relationship of this goddess with Vanadurgā. The iconographic features are different.

According to the Śritattvanidhi Vanaśankarī has three eʌes. She wears crescent on the ह्ad. A mukuṭa also adorns her head which is decked with various jewels. In her ten hands she holds a trident (śūla), a skull (kapāla), an arrow (śara), a bow (chāpa), an iron rod (parigha), a conch (śaṅkha), a disc (chakra), a mace (gadā). The rest two hands show varada and abhaya poses.

Agnidurgā is of golden colour ( kanakavarṇā ), brilliant like the lightning. She is of fierce look and rides on a lion. In this position she is flanked by two damsels (kanyās), holding in their hands a sword (karvāla) and a shield (kheṭa). Over the head she wears the crescent. Her two hands show the poses of varada and tarjani. Rest of six hands hold disc (chakra), a sword (asi), a shield (kheṭa), an arrow (bāṇa), a bow (chāpa), and a goad (aṅkuśa). She has three eyes. (S. T. 105)

Vahnivāsinīdurgā is of complexion like the colour of molten gold. She wears a mukuṭa decked with maṇi and has three eyes and eight hands. They show in them a lotus (padma), a conch (śaṅkha), a bow of sugarcane (ikṣuchāpa) and himakiraṇa in the left hands and a sword (karavāla), a golden horn (hemasṛṅga), flower arrow (kusumamayaśara) and a citrus (mātuliṅga) in the right hands. (S. T. 21).

Jvālāmālinī is a different deity than Vahnivāsinī. She is also of placid nature. But she is of red complexion like the colour of fire (jvālā) and has six faces. Her hands are twelve. In her left hands she shows a noose (pāśa), a shield (kheṭaka), a flower named kañja, an arrow (śara), a spear (śūla), and the last one shows the posture of vara. In the right hands she is described to have a goad (aṅkuśa), a sword (khaḍga), a spear (śakti), an arrow (śara), a bow (chāpa), and the last one is in the abhaya posture. (S. T. 30).

Basing on the same text Rao describes the goddess as holding a chakra, a khaḍga, a kheṭaka, a bāṇa, a pāśa and an aṅkuśa. The rest two hands show varada and tarjanī poses.[15]

Jayadurgā is the most lustrous, which fills the three worlds. She is three eyed and rides on a lion. The crescent adorns the head and in her hands she holds a conch (śaṅkha), a disc (chakra), a sword (kṛpāṇa) and a trident (triśūla). Her complexion is black (S. T. 122)

This description of Jayadurgā is based on the Sāradātilakam.

Vindhyavāsinī Durgā, according to the Śrītattvanidhi, is to be shown in the midst of a lotus (ambujamadhya). Her colour is golden and bright like the thunder. She adorns herself with various ornaments such as graiveyaka, aṅgada, hāra, kuṇḍala as well as the crescent on her head. She is a three eyed goddess and has four hands. Out of these, two of her hands hold a conch and a disc and the rest of the two hands show the varada and the abhaya poses. Her mout is a lion (pañchānana). (S. T. 123).

Ripumāri, the goddess of fearful look (bhayaṅkarī) is of red colour. She has two hands of which one holds the trident and the other shows the tarjanī pose (S. T. 124).

DAŚA MAHĀVIDYĀ

Among the Tāntric worshippers Mahāvidyās have significant place. They are ten in number and called Mahāvidyās for they are sources of all that is to be known.[16]

The whole cycle of existence like that of day and night can be divided into ten main parts, all representing the ten aspects of Divine Transcendent-knowledge. To know them is knowing the secret of the universe. They are the energies of which the universe is the pulsation.[17]

The ten Mahāvidyās are personified under the names Kālī or Śyāmā, Tārā, Chinnamastā, Sundarī, Bāglā, Mātaṅgī, Bhuvaneśānī or Bhuvaneśvarī, Siddhavidyā, Bhairavī and Dhūmāvatī.[18]

Of this list of the Mahāvidyās, most of them are mentioned in the Śrī tattvanidhi with their iconographic features.

The first and the foremost of the list is Kālī She is specifically described as Prathamā or Ādyā. She is the supreme power of destruction. As such, she has been described as Mahākālī. She in the Kālī Tantra[19] has been described as the goddess of four hands. In two hands she has a sword and a head and her other two hands show the gestures of abhaya and varada. She stands upon a corpse. She is a fearful goddess, her laughter shows her dreadful teeth. She is naked and black. Her tongue is hanging out and she wears a garland of heads. In the Devī Purāṇa, she is described as of terrific features (Kālikarāla-rūpā). In the Bhaviṣya Purāṇa her colour is described as black like the clouds (ghanaśyāmā), but her face is red as copper (tāmra-rakta). Her hands hold a head and karṇikā flower (kapālakarṇikāhastā).[20]

In the Śrītattvanidhi, this goddess has been described as having eight hands. In these hands she shows a conch (śaṅkha), a disc (chakra), a mace (gadā), a pot (kumbha), a pestle (mūśala), an elephant goad (aṅkuśa), a noose (pāśa) and a thunderbolt (vajra). Her colour is that of clouds (S. T. 63).

In the Tāntric texts she has been unanimously described as remaining in a state of eternal bliss and playing in the bosom of Śiva.[21]

The second object of transcendent, Tārā, the source of light, is also called as representing the power of hunger.[22] The Devīsahasranāma explains the etymology of Tārā as one who leads to the other shore (taratyāyanayā sā tārā). She is also the manifestation of Kālī, the power of destruction and she serves the purpose of Kālī by manifesting her ability to devour the universe through her hunger. She is always hungry.[23]

As the power of hunger she has a place in the Buddhist as well as in the Jaina pantheon.

In the Jaina inconography she is described as seated on a lotus. She holds in her four hands a citrus, two lotuses and a rosary.[24] With this form she is mentioned as Dhāranī yakṣiṇī in the Jaina scriptures, particularly in the Śvetāmbara concept. Among the Digambara Jainas she is conceived as riding on a swan and holding a snake, a vajra, a mṛga in the three of her hands. The fourth hand is in the varada posture.[25]

The Buddhist Sādhanamālās describes a number of Tārās emaciating from Amoghasiddhi as well as in other capacities under various names and colours. But the text of Śrītattvanidhi describes only one form of Tārā, which is known as Ugratārā–an adoption from the Buddhist pantheon.[26] This is to be pointed out that this goddess with this name does not find its place in the Buddhist Sādhanamālās and in the Jaina list of goddesses.

Further, she has been described as of short stature and dressed in tiger skin. She wears the garland of skulls. Her tongue is held out a bit. Ṛsi Akṣobhya resides in her forehead. She has three eyes.[27]

According tothe Prāṇatoṣaṇi[28] the name Ugratārā is because she is a fierce (ugra) goddess and because she protects her devotees from the fierce (Ugratāriṇī). She is of the sindūra colour. She sits in the pratyālīḍha pose and holds in the three hands a sword (khaṅga), a spear (śūla) and a kharpara. In the rest of hands she shows the gesture of varada. (S. T. 69).

Chinnamastā does not find any place in the description of goddesses in the Śrītattvanidhi. In some of the lists of Mahāvidyās, instead Chinnamastā, Ṣodaṣī, is mentioned as the third Mahāvidyā.[29] In the Ṣodaṣī Tantra Ṣodaṣī is to be identified with Tripura Sundarī.[30] She is described as having four arms holding a noose, an elephant hook, an arrow and a bow. In the Śrī- tattvanidhi Tripurasundarī is described as having four hands and of sindūra colour. In her hands she has a noose, an elephant hook, a sugarcane (Ikṣu) bow and the flower arrow. (S. T. 32).

She, in iconographic features, is identical with Rājarājesvarī.

She is also described as standing in the orbit of Sun (bhānumaṇḍala madhyasthā).[31]

On the basis of the Śāradātilakam this text describes a form of Bālā-Tripurasundarī also. She is a goddess of red colour (raktavarṇaḥ) and bright like the light of thousands of Sun. She has four hands in which she holds a book (vidyā), a rosary. Rest two hands are in the varada and abhaya poses. (S. T. 127).

Another goddess Kulasundarī is almost identical to the Bālāsundarī or Bālā. According to the description of the Śrītattvanidhi she is red like the colour of the rising sun and has adorned her head with crescent diadem. She has three eyes and a smiling face. In her two hands she holds a rosary (mālā) and a book (pustaka). The rest of the two hands show the varada and abhaya gestures. (S. T. 25).

The fourth goddess of the Mahāvidyā list is Bhuvaneśvarī, the lady of the spheres. Her colour is red like the colour of the rising sun. She has crescent on her crown and adorns herself with various ornaments such as Kuṇḍala, hāra, graiveyaka, Kāñchī, maṇi, valaya etc. She sits on the lotus throne and has three eyes. Her two hands show the abhaya and varada gestures and the rest two hold noose and an elephant goad. (S. T. 81.)

The Bhuvaneśvarītantra depicts the goddess in the same way as in the Śrītattvanidhi. Here she is described as the goddess, having the moon diadem, large breasts and three eyes. She has smiling face and shines like the rising sun. Her hands grant boons (vara), allay fears (abhyaya) and hold an elephant hook and a noose.[32]

Some other descriptions suggest that the goddess has on her head a serpent (nāga), a liṅga and a yoni and holds in her four hands a cup, a mace, a shield and the Śrīphala. Her colour is like the molten gold.[33]

On the basis of the Śāradātilakam, the Śrītattvanidhi describes two other forms of Bhuvaneśvarī with the names Saubhāgya-Bhuvaneśvarī and Māyā-Bhuvaneśvarī. The former is of the colour of sindūra and has three eyes and broad (pīna) breasts. She adorns her person with various jewels and holds in her two hands a cup and a red lotus. (S. T. 117).

Māyā-Bhuvaneśvarī is of blue colour (śyāmāṅgī or nīlavarṇāḥ) and has crescent on her head. She has also three eyes but four hands. The hands hold a cup and a lotus and one of her hands is in the abhaya pose. The fourth hand is not described. She is adorned with various ornaments and has the red lotus throne. (S. T. 118).

Rājeśvarī who is Sindūravarṇā is described in the Śrītattvanidhi on the basis of the text named Śodaṣī Kalpa. Her bodily features in terms of beauty are excellent. H. K. Shastri finds perfect similarity in iconographic features of this goddess with Lalitā and Tripura Sundarī.[34] According to him they are the most famous of these milder deities. All are highly beautiful and of dazzling brilliance. They have four hands each and hold the symbols a noose (or a fruit), a goad (or a conch), a sugarcane bow (or mirror) and five arrows (or a lotus or a cup of collyrium).

In the Śrītattvanidhi the individual iconographic features and emblems etc. of this goddess are not described. (S. T. 2).

H. K. Shastri[35] further points out that their worship is directly connected with the mystic geometrical drawings known as chakras. Images of these goddesses are not so much found as the chakras over which she is supposed to preside.

Chinnamastā, who is not described in the Śrītattvanidhi is very popular among the Tāntric Buddhist worshippers as Vajra yoginī. According to the Chinnamastā Tantra this beheaded goddess be described as follows :

·Her left foot foremost in battle, she holds her severed head and knife. Naked, she drinks voluptuously the stream of the blood nectar flowing from her beheaded body. The jewel on her forehead is tied with a serpent. She has three eyes. Her breasts are adorned with lotuses. Inclined towards bust,

she sits erect above the god of love who shows signs of lustfulness. She looks like red rose, but her eyes are blue.' [6]

There are some other forms of Vajrayoginī in which the head of the goddess is intact on the shoulder of the deity. The red form of Vajrayoginī sits on corpse and holds in her two hands a vajra and a kapāla.[38]

Bhairavī is the sixth of the Mahāvidyā list. She is so called because she is really a fearful goddess. She is the power of Death. Chinnamastā represents the end of things abruptly. But Bhairavi is perpetual destruction. She is also the contrast of Bhuvaneśvarī. For all that which Bhuvaneśvarī protects she ceaselessly destroys. She is also called Tripura Bhairavī, the fearful goddess of the three cities.[39]

The Śrītattvanidhi describes the iconography of Tripura–Bhairavī on the basis of the Śāradātilakam. The same description is also incorporated in the Tripura–Bhairavī Tantra with slight difference.[40]

According to the Śrītattvanidhi Tripura–Bhairavī sits on the lotus throne. She shines with a crimson glow comparable with the glow of a thousand newly risen suns. She wears a silken veil and a garland of skulls. Blood streams her breast. She has lotus like face with three voluptuous eyes. She has crescent over her head. Her four hands show the gestures of victory (jayavatī) of wisdom (vidyām), allaying of fear (abhīti) and the granting of boons (varada). Her colour is red. (S. T. 125).

Saṁvit–Tripurā is a peaceful goddess having there eyes. Her colour is white. In her four hands she holds a book (pustaka), a rosary (japavaṭī), a pot full of ambrosia (amritādhyakumbham) and the rest one has in the teaching (vyākhyāna) pose. This description of Saṁvit-Tripurā is on the basis of the Śāradātilakam. (S. T. 1261).

Dhūmāvatī the 7th of the list of Mahāvidyā is the goddess of poverty (dāridra) and misfortune (alakṣmī). Once all is destroyed the universe goes into smoke hence the power of ultimate destruction is called Dhūmāvatī, the smoky one. Her visage can be seen in the destitute, the beggars, the lepers, the diseased. She dwells in the wounds of the earth, in desert, ruined houses, tatters, hunger, thirst, widowhood, quarrels, the mourning of children etc.[41]

The Dhūmāvatī Tantra describes her as women of unhealthy complexion, restless, wicked, tall, with a dirty robe and disheaveled hair. With gaps of her teeth she looks like a widow, and holds in her hand a winnowing basket. Her eyes are cruel, her hands tremble, her nose is long. She behaves deceitfully and is shy in her looks. Insatiably hungry and thirsty, she inspires fear and is the instigator of quarrels.[42] She is also to be compared with Kālarātri.

Dhūmāvati (Nepal)

The Śrītattvanidhi describe this goddess slight differently. According to this text she is surrounded by a band of pichāśas. She is of red complexion, also wears the garment of the same colour. Her teeth are protruded and fearful (karāla) and wear the kuṇḍalas in her ears. She also adorns herself with the skull-garland (muṇḍa-mālā) She laughs loudly (aṭṭahāsa). Her two hands hold skull (kapāla) and sword (asi). She has three eyes and a crescent (śaśi śiśu) on the head. (S. T. 67).

Bāgalā, the deceitful goddess is the eighth of the Mahāvidyās. According to the Śrītattvanidhi she is of yellow complexion. She has three eyes and four hands. In them she holds a trident (triśūla), a cup (pāna-pātra), a mace (gadā) and the tongue of the enemy, (jihvāmchavibhratim). She has the features of a beautiful women so far her lips, neck and breasts are concerned. She sits on the lotus throne (kamalāsanā). (S. T. 83).

The Bāgalāmukhī Tantra describes her as a two armed goddess, who with the left hand grasps the tongue of her enemy and with a mace in the right hand tortures him. She is clad in yellow garments.[43]

The power of domination is Mātaṅgī, the ninth of the Mahāvidyās. She is also the goddess of royality. After the Demon is defeated she establishes the rule of peace, of calm, of prosperty. In the Mātaṅgī Tantra she is described as dark, with a white crescent in her garland and with three lotus eyes. She sits resplendent on a jeweled throne. She holds in her four hands a noose, a sword, a shield and an elephant hook.[44]

Mātangī in the above form is not described in the Śrītattvanidhi. One special form of the goddess as Rājamātaṅgī is mentioned in the text. According to this description the goddess is of black complexion and sits upon a throne which is set with the ratnas. Her one leg rests upon a lotus the other is on the throne itself. In one hand she holds a viṇā and in the other a mālā. She holds a crescent on the head. She is to be shown listening the talks of a parrot which is at her side (sruṇavatim śukajalpatim). Her garments are of red colour. Her forehead is adorned with a tilaka. (S. T. 79).

This account is incorporated in the Rājamātaṅgī Kalpa also.[45]

The tenth Mahāvidyā is Kamalā. She is also named as Lakṣmī, the goddess of wealth. As Kamalā she is the consort of Sadāśiva, an aspect of Viṣṇu. In the Kamalā Tantra she is described as of golden complexion, bathed in the stream of amborsia flowing from golden vessels held by the trunks of four white elephants, she looks like the abode of snow, the Himālaya. Her hands grant boons (varada) allay fear (abhaya) and hold two lotuses. She has a brilliant diadem over her head. Her hips, like ripe fruits, are loosely draped in a silken garment.[46]

The Śrītattvanidhi collects her eight forms, namely Lakṣmī (as the consort of Viṣṇu), Gaja-Lakṣmī, Mahālakṣmī, Śrī, Vīralakṣmī, two armed Vīralakṣmī, eight armed Vīralakṣmī, Prasanna Lakṣmī etc. We shall study these forms elsewhere (Ch. V.).

According to the Śrītattvanidhi Gajalakṣmī[47] is to be shown in the white garment. When she is depicted as an independent deity (not as the consort of Viṣṇu) she has four hands. She sits in the padmāsana pose on the eight petal lotus, which itself is on a simhāsana. In one of the right hands she holds the long lotus stalk and in the left the pot of ambrosia. In rest of the two hands she holds the vilva fruit and the conch. Two elephants standing at the back or sides (piṣṭhe) by turning the trunks empty the vessels over the head of the goddess. The goddess Gajalakṣmī is also adorned with a beautiful lotus on her head. She is of the golden colour. (S. T. 109).

Mahālakṣmī, as a special form of Lakṣmī should be delineated according to the form of Lakṣmī. She is a goddess of four hands. The lower right hand holds a vessel (pātra) and the upper right hand holds the mace named Kaumodakī. The upper left hand shows kheṭaka and the lower holds Śrīphala. The goddess show the emblem of Liṅga over her head. Her colour is also of gold. (S. T. 110).

THE PĪṬHEŚVARĪS

Some of the goddesses mentioned in the Śrītattvanidhi are the Pīṭhadevis. They are also mentioned in the famous texts entitled Pīṭhanirṇaya or Mahāpīṭhanirūpaṇa.[48] D. C. Sircar has listed the Pīṭhadevis mentioning also their pīṭhas, aṅga pratyaṅgas and Bhairavas in his work. "The Śākta Pīṭhas" on the basis of the above mentioned texts.[49] The text of Śrītattvanidhi does not mention the Pīṭhadevis, occuring in the Pīṭhanirṇaya or in the Mahāpīṭhanirūpaṇa where it deals with the Pīṭheśvari dhyānam. Here under this group the Śrītattvanidhi mentions only seven demi-goddesses such as Śākinī, Kākinī, Lākinī, Rākinī, Dākinī, Hākinī and Yākinī, along with their repective iconographic features. Of all these only Rākinī is included as the pīṭhadevī in the Pīṭhaniraṇaya and Pīṭhanirūpāṇa lists as the presiding deity of Godāvarī tīrtha. She represents the vāmānguli of the Śakti.

But some of the pīṭhadevis of the traditional lists are mentioned in this text. Some of them, however, are categorised in other groups also. For example, Vārāhī, Kaumārī, Indrākṣī are the members of Saptamātṛkās. Kamalā, Tripura-Sundarī (Śodaṣī) and Bhuvaneśvarī are included in the Ten Mahāvidyā list. Kātyāyanī and the Chaṇḍeśvarī are indentical goddesses. Similarly, Prastāriṇī and Vīrā of the Pīṭhanirṇaya are the Vajraprastāriṇī and Śūrā of the Śrītattvanidhi. Bhavānī of the Pīṭhanirṇaya also may be identified with Tuljābhavānī of the Śrītattvanidhi. Annapūrṇā and Mahālakṣmī are the consorts of Viṣṇu and Sāvitrī and Gāyatrī of Brahmā. Of the above Pīṭheśvaris the iconographic features of Vajraprastāriṇī Śūrā and Tuljābhavānī are presented here. Rest are dealt with elsewhere, under other categories.

Vajraprastāriṇī is of red complexion and shows crescent over her head. She is three eyed and shows in her six hands a citrus (vījapūraka), a noose (pāśa), a goad (aṅkuśa), a pestle (mūsala), a bow (dhanu) and a skull (kapāla). (S. T. 119).

Prastāriṇī and Vajraprastāriṇī are emaciated from the pupil of the eye (netrāṅśatārā). She is seated in a lotus, in a boat floating in an ocean of blood. The limbs of her body as well as her head are also bathed with blood.

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

According to the Śilparatna Vajraprastāriṇī is a form of Pārvatī and has six hands, showing a sugarcane bow, a flower arrow, the varada and abhaya postures, a noose and a skull and is engaged in vanquishing Māra, the god of Love.[50]

Tuljābhavānī is a three eyed beautiful goddess of red complexion. She has features like the goddess Annapūrṇā. (S. T. 97).

The Śrītattvanidhi does not provide the description of her attributes of hands. But on the basis of other texts she is stated to have held in one hand a vessel of delicious food and in another a spoon for distributing the same.[51]

Jayadurgā representing the heart of Satī and the presiding goddess of Vaidyanātha dhāma has already been described. Vijayā is the presiding deity of Virjākṣetra in the Utkala and represents nābhi of Satī. The Śrītattvanidhi describes the feature of Vijayā as follows :

Vijayā is five faced goddess having three eyes. She is of red colour and wears yellow garments. Her hands show the emblems of a conch (śaṅkha), a discus (chakra), a noose (pāśa), a goad or sickle (śriṇi), a shield (kheṭa), a sword (khaḍga) in her two hands, a bow (chāpa), an arrow (bāṇa) and citrus (mātulaṅga). (S T. 28).

In the Devī Bhāgavata Purāṇa Vijayā is described as the twin of Jayā. Both the goddesses are four armed holding in three hands a śūla, a padma, an akṣamālā and the fourth show the varada pose. They have lion as their mount.[52]

Maṅgalā is the pīṭheśvarī of Ujjayinī. Though there is iconographic difference between Maṅgalā and Sarvamaṅgalā, but it seems that both are one and the same goddess.

Maṅgalā according to the Devī Purāṇa, is shown seated upon a lion (simhāsanā) and wears on her head a Jaṭāmukuṭa. She has ten hands carrying in eight of her hands a śūla, a akṣamālā, a dhanus, a mirror, the arrow, a kheṭaka, a khaḍga and the chandra ?. The remaining two hands show varada and abhaya poses.

Sarvamaṅgalā is shown seated on a lion and shows in her four hands the akṣasūtra, a padma, a śūla and a kamaṇḍalu. This description of Sarvamaṅgalā is based on the Viṣṇudharmottara Purāṇa.[53]

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

In the Śrītattvanidhi Sarvamaṅgalā has been described differently. Here the goddess is stated to be of golden complexion and sits on a multi-petal lotus She bestows by one right hand wealth to her devotees and the other hand is in the varada pose. Her one left hand holds mātuliṅga and the next is in the abhaya pose. (S. T. 29).

Kāmeśī, the chief of the Pīṭheśvarī goddess, is more pupularly known as Kāmākṣyā and represents the yoni of Satī. Her abode is Kāmagiri in Kāmarūpa.

According to the description of the Śrītattvanidhi she is of the red colour (aruṇa) and has three eyes. In her six hands she holds a noose (pāśa), a bow of sugarcane (ikṣuchāpa), the pot full of honey (madhupūrṇa pātra), a big goad (mahā-aṅkuśa), the arrow of flower (puṣpa-śara) and the remaining hand shows the boon conferring posture (vara). (S. T. 17).

There are several lists of pīṭheśvari in the Tāntric texts. The number of goddesses vary from 7, 8, 10, 18, 42, 50 to 108.[54] Of all these, the goddesses whose names are identified with the Pīṭheśvaris given in the Tantra texts are tabulated here mentioning the aṅgas and upāṅgas representing and also their abode.

Some of the Durgās do not form the part of any traditional list or categories. They are either local deities or represent some of the divine power or characteristics of Durgā. A number of goddess, such as Lopāmudrā, Aparājitā, Kuruku'lā, Kāmakeli etc. are the borrowings from different sets Vedic, Buddhist or Jain. Lopāmudrā, however is found defied only in this text. Since the time of the Vedas, she has been held high as a vedic mantradraṣṭā. The iconographic feature of the goddess, however, do not suggest any vedic trait. Among the Tantra Upāsakas Lopāmudrā is a very famous goddess as a form of Pañchadaśīvidyā. She is said to be a goddess having three eyes and four hands. In them she holds a noose (pāśa), a goad (aṅkuśa), an arrow (śara) and a bow (chāpa). She shows three eyes. Her glamour is like the sun and has moon as her diadem (chandra chūḍām). She is in the achala mudrā. Most significantly she has been described as Śivā. Her complexion is red like Sindūra (S. T. 107).

Aparājitā is an adoption from the Buddhist pantheon. But her iconography considerably differs from the description in the Sādhanamālās. Here in the Śrītattvanidhi she is described on the basis of Nārada Saṁhitā, as a goddess as having the complexion of blue lotus (nīlotpala). Her eyes are half open. Her hair are also blue (nīla) and curly and below the navel she shows trivalli. She is the destroyer of the grief of one who is subdued to her and her hands in the vara and the abhaya poses also hold lotuses. Her garments are of yellow colour. Alternatively, she may also be shown as a four handed goddess holding in three hands a conch (śaṅkha), a discus (chakra), a club (gadā) and the fourth one is in the abhaya posture. She has three eyes (S. T. 72).

Fig. 13
Aparājitā
(Pala School – Patna Museum)

In the Buddhist Sādhanamālā Aparājitā is described as of yellow complexion. She is two-armed, one faced, and is decked in various gems, and templed upon Gaṇeśa. Her right hand is raised, displaying the act of dealing a slap, while the left carries the noose round the raised index finger against her chest, her face is awful, terrible and ferocious. She is the destroyer of all wicked beings, and her parasol is raised over the head by the host of wicked and ferocious gods, Brahmā and others.[55]

Aparājitā in the Jain Iconography is described as a goddess riding a lion and bearing hands, equipped with a citrus, a sword, a shield. The fourth hand is in the varada pose. She in the Jain pantheon is classed among the yakṣiṇis.[56]

Śavasthāvēśinī is a fierce goddess and inspires dread to those who see at her. Her colour is red. She dwells amidst corpses (śavavāsinī). This fearful goddess (raudrī) has three faces and her eyes look like smoke (dhūmrākṣī). She, the goddess of huge body (bhīmāṅgī) having three braids of black hair (trijaṭā), holds in her two hands kettle-drum (dhakkā) and a spear (śūla). She is the destroyer of enemies. (S. T. 74).

Śatruvindhyavāsinī is the fear aspect of Saumyavindhyavāsinī. This goddess has three faces and three red eyes. Her face is fierce (raudra) like the burning fire (agnijvālā raudramukhī) and fearful flangs (ghoradaṇṣṭrā). She is naked, with big and capacious belly. Her hands and hair are bathed with blood. The poses and emblems of the hands are not described in the text. The basis of this description is Sudarśana Saṁhitā (S. T. 73).

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

Laghuśyāmalā is of black (śyāma) colour. Her garments are of blood-red colour and holds the wine-pot in her hands. Her eyes are rolled due to intoxication. Her breasts are full. She also holds in her hands a conch (śaṅkha) and a tāṭanka. This description is based on Śyāmalākalpa (S. T. 78).

Mṛtasañjīvanī is a placid and auspicious (śāntarūpam) having eight hands. She sits on a lotus (padmāsanā) and her complexion is red. She holds a noose (pāśa), a snake (ahi), a goad (aṅkuśa), a club (gadā), a sword (khaḍga), a spear (śūla) and shows varada and abhaya postures. (S. T. 82).

Bhagamālā is red like lotus and most beautiful. She has six hands showing a Karavāla, a lotus (paṅkaja), a noose (pāśa), sickle (sṛṇi), a bow of sugarcane (ikṣudaṇḍa) and a flower arrow (puṣpāyudha). (S. T. 17).

Nityaklinnā is red like the rising sun and has three eyes. Decked with beautiful ornaments, she holds in her hands a noose (pāśa), a sickle (śreṇī), a drinking pot (pānapātra). Two of her hands show the gestures of varada and abhaya. (S. T. 19).

There are two forms of Nityā devis described in the Śrītattvanidhi with considerable difference from the point of view of emblems and hand poses. Thus, in one form she is described as having red colour like the colour of rising sun. She has three eyes and twelve hands. In the left hands she has a noose (pāśa), a rosary (akṣasūtra), a bow (dhanu), a discus (kheṭaka), a spear (śūla), and show the boon bestowing pose (abhīṣṭhadam). In the right six hands she holds a goad (aṅkuśa), a book (pustaka), a flower (kusuma), a sword (khaṅga), a skull (kapāla) and the last one is in the abhaya pose. (S. T. 26).

The second form of Nityādevi is also of red complexion. But the hands of this goddess as described in the Śāradātilakam, are less than the above mentioned form. Here the goddess has only four hands showing a noose (pāśa), a goad (aṅkuśa), the symbol of kalpalatā and the last one holds a kapāla. She has three eyes and adorns the chuḍā with crescent (bāla-śaśāṅka). (S. T. 128).

Mohinīnityādevī is also described in the same text as of red colour and has the crescent over the head. She is prayed by the gods (amaras) and holds in her hands a lotus (aṁbhoja), a noose (pāśa), a sickle (śreṇi) and a skull (kapāla). She wears the garment of red colour and has three eyes. (S. T. 21).

Bheruṇḍā devī, the mother of the three world (tribhuvana jananī), and the wishfulfilling goddess of her devotees is most beautiful and fair in complexion (gaura) like muktā or kundendu. She wears the garland of guñjā seeds which rests between the breasts and her mukuṭa is decked with maṇis. Her seat is on a golden pedestal (svarṇapīṭham) amidst the lotus. She is a three eyed goddess and has four hands holding a rosary (akṣa), a spoon (śruka). Her rest of the two hands show the gesture of abhaya and varada. She wears crescent over the head (chandrachūḍam). (S. T. 20).

Tvaritā is also included in the list of pīṭhadevis as Mahāvegā. And as Kṣudhā or Tārā she is also described as one of the ten Mahāvidyās. N.N. Vasu finds traits of resemblance between Tvaritā and Manasā, the mother of serpents, and also with the Scythian goddess Tvaritā. She is the goddess of the kirātas and has two hands. She is decorated with peacocks feather on the head, and wears a cloth of leaves, a garland of guñjā seeds and a (head) jewel of eight serpents. This description, as quoted by H. K. Sastri[57], is based partly on the Śāradā Tilakam. The full description of Tvaritā of Śārādā Tilakam is also quoted in the Śritattvanidhi. Besides that her head is adorned with peacock feather, body with the cloth of leaves, breasts with the garland of guñjā seeds, and head with the jewel of eight serpents, her hands wear the aṅgada and the ears the tāṭaṅka. She shows three eyes and has two hands in the posture of abhīti and varada. Her complexion is described as black. (S. T. 129).

Elsewhere, in the Śritattvanidhi, the goddess Tvaritā is described a bit differently. Here she is said to have three eyes. Her head is decked with nāga (nagaiḥ kalpit bhūṣaṇam) and breast with the garland of guñjā seeds. But instead being a two armed goddess, she is described as having four hands. Two hands hold a noose (pāśa) and a goad (aṅkuśa) and the rest two (second and fourth) show the postures of vara and abhaya. She is amidst the yellow leaves (pītapallavavāsinim) and has over the heads feathers of peacock (śikhiśikhāchūḍā). She resides on the pīṭha to be carried by bears and lions (rikṣa-simha vahaḥ). The beautiful goddess is described as of yellow complexion. (S. T. 24).

According to the Śilparatna, Tvaritā is a widow and has crow as her mount.

Mahāvajreśvarī dwells amidst the red lotus and is of red colour. She has three eyes and four hands having a noose (pāśa), a bow of sugarcane (kodaṇḍam ikshu), a sickle (śreṇi), and pomegranate (dāḍimphalam). (S. T. 22).

Nīlapatākā is of blue complexion. She has three eyes and five faces and ten hands. In her four left hands she holds a noose (pāśa), a flag (patākā), a lotus (padma), a bow (chāpa) and the last one is in the varada pose. The right four hands hold a goad (aṅkuśa), a sword (khaḍga), a spear (śakti), a big arrow (mahābāṇa) and the last left hand is in the abhaya posture. (S. T. 27).

The goddess Chitrā is of red complexion and has crescent over her head. She has three eyes and four hands showing a noose (pāśa), a goad (aṅkuśa), vara and abhaya poses in them. She is decked with jewel (navaratnam) and her wearings are decorated with peculiar figures (chitra). (S. T. 31).

Bhadrakālī, the eighteen armed goddess is described in the Śritattvanidhi as handsome in appearance. She is just a counterpart of Mahākālī, the fearful goddess. She has three eyes and holds in her hands a rosary (akṣamālā), a trident (triśūla), a sword (khaṇga), the shield (charma), an arrow (bāṇa), a bow (chāpa), a conch (śaṅkha), a lotus (padma), the sruka and sruvā, a water pot (kamaṇḍalu), a staff (daṇḍa), a spear (śakti), the kṛṣṇājina and the fire (hutāsana). One of the remaining hands is in the abhaya (śānti) pose and the rest holds a jewelled pot (ratnapātra). She is of blue complexion She sits in the ālīḍha pose on the chariot carried by four lions.[58] (S. T. 35).

Pratyaṅgirā, the lion-faced goddess is a fierce one. She is of black colour, and has three eyes and four hands holding a skull (kapāla), a spear (śūla), a kettle drum (damaru) and a noose of snake (nāgapāśa). Her hair stands erect on her head which is also adorned with moon. She mounts a lion and destroys the enemies.[59] (S. T. 65).

Śūlanī, is also terrible goddess having lion as her mount. According to one description, as quoted by H. K. Sastri, this goddess has eighteen arms. She holds a trident. She is also accompanied by four unmarried girls with swords and shields in their hands.[60]

According to the description of the Śritattvanidhi the goddess mounts the lion and is surrounded by a group of four girls (kanyā) holding a sword (asi) and a shield (kheṭa). She has the colour of black-cloud and also the head-gear (kirīṭa) of the same colour. The description of emblems of her hands is not very clear. According to this text she holds a spear (śūla), an arrow (bāṇa), a sword (asi ?) club (gadā), a noose (pāśa) and a bow (chāpa). (S. T. 66).

Vaśyamukhī is of red colour and has in her two hands with flower-arrow (sumanabāṇa) and a bow of sugar cane (ikṣudhanu). (S. T. 68).

The goddess Kuruku'lā is of black complexion (śyāmā) and her bodice is also of the same co'our. She rides in the boat of maṇi (maṇinaukā) and enjoys liquor and flesh (madamāṅśa). In her two hands she holds jewel (ratna) and the rudder (aritra). This description of the goddess is based on Lalitopākhyāna. (S. T. 70).

Kurukullā is one of the most popular Buddhist goddess and worshipped in Tibbet as well as in China. She emanates from the Dhyānī Buddha Amitābha. She according to the Sādhanamālās may be shown with one face and may have two, four, six or eight arms. When she is two handed she is called Śukla Kurukullā and holds in her hands a rosary and the bowl of lotus. The four handed Kurukullas are four and known with the names as Tārodabhava Kurukullā, Uḍḍiyāna Kurakullā. Tārodabhava Kurukullā is of red colour and with red garments and sits on the red lotus. The two left hands are in the abhaya pose and an arrow and the rest two right hands carry a bow and a red lotus. Under her seat Kāma and his wife should be shown. She is in the fulness of youth and displays amorous sentiments. Uḍḍiyāna kurukullā is of terrible appearance and of red colour. She rides on a corpse. She wears the garland of heads, the five skulls on her head. She has protruding teeth and tongue and her brown colour hair are rising over her head in the shape of the flame. Her eyes are red and round and three in number. Her principal pair of hands are engaged in drawing the bow of flower and charging an arrow of red lotus. The second pair of hands hold a goad of flower and the red lotus.

The six handed Kurukullā is of red complexion and known as Māyājāla-karma Kurukullā. She exhibits the trailokya vijaya mudrā in the first pair of hands; and carries aṅkuśa and the red lotus in the second pair and the full drawn bow charged with an arrow in the third.

Aṣṭabhujī Kurukullā is also of red colour but not so terrific as other Kurukullās. She displays the trailokya vijaya mudrā in the first pair of hands and shows in the other right hands aṅkuśa, an arrow and the varada pose. In the remaining left hands she holds a noose, a bow, and the utpala.

Uḍḍiyāna Kurukullā is also worshipped as Vajrayoginī.

Kurukullā is a goddess to be worshipped for attaining the vaśī-karaṇa power.[61]

The Goddess Vāruṇī is seated on a boat bedecked with gem (maṇi). She is also named as Sudhāmālinī and Amṛteśvarī. She is surrounded by the army of Śaktis. Her cheeks and eye-brows are red like the colour of rising sun and she decorates her tresses with the flowers of the pārijāta. She maddens the three worlds by her glance. She holds in two of the hands the cup full of wine and a beautiful lotus. In rest of two hands she carries the cooked piece of flesh and the box of gems (maṇipātra).[62] (S. T. 71).

Prāṇaśakti presides over the centres of physical life (prāṇa). H K. Śāstri compares the goddess with Vajraprastāriṇī and describes that she is seated on a lotus springing from a boat of blood, in an ocean of blood, and holds among the other weapons a human skull filled with blood.[63]

According to the Śilparatna this goddess is a form of Pārvatī. She has six hands, exhibiting in her hands a sugar-cane bow, a flower arrow, the varada and the abhaya postures, a noose, a skull. She is shown engaged in vanquishing Māra.[64]

According to the Śritattvanidhi she is of red colour and has three eyes. She sits on a lotus of red colour which itself is on a boat of red colour,

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh
Her boat floats in the ocean of blood. Her hands are six. These hands hold a noose (pāśa), a bow, made of sugar-cane, with the thread of maṇis, a goad (aṅkuśa), and the five arrows (pañca bāṇa). The description of Śritattvanidhi is based on Śāradātilakam. (S. T. 84).

The goddess Prāṇaśakti is invoked by the Brahmaṇas at the time of infussion of an image with life (Prāṇapratiṣṭhā).[65]

The mother (Ambā) Kamaleśvarī is a six armed goddess holding a lotus (paṅkaja), a noose (pāśa), a bow (of sugar cane), five arrows of flower. The rest of two hands show the postures of abhaya and vara. (S. T. 87).

The goddess Surā is an unmarried girl (kanyakārūpa). She has three eyes and eighteen hands. The emblems and the postures she shows in the left hands are a conch (śaṅkha), a sword (khaṅga), a bow (dhanu), a skull (kapāla), a pestle (mūsala), a spear (śakti), a club (gadā), the posture of varada, bell (ghaṇṭā). Her right hands have a discus (chakra), the muṣṭi, an arrow (śāra), a trident (śūla), an iron (loha), a shield (kheṭa), the tomara, the posture of abhaya and the bhindipāla.

She is the personification of wine and thus a terror to the demons and a blessing to gods (devas). She is Umā herself and her consort Śiva is the power of intoxication (moha). (S. T. 90).

Śītalā is to be shown as naked (digambarā) on the back of a donkey. She is of black complexion. She shows a winnowing fan (śurpa) over her head and a broom (mārjanī) and water pot (kalaśa) in her hands. (S. T. 106)

A Durgā having sixteen arms is mentioned in the Śritattvanidhi. But the emblems of the hands are not given here. She is described as having three eyes and trident entwined with snake (pannagayuktaṁ śūlam). This feature is very common with the gods and goddesses of the Buddhist pantheon. Some of the gods and goddesses of the Buddhist pantheon hold sword or trident entwined with snake. She is naked (digaṁbara) and wears the ornaments of snakes (pannagavalaya). Her neck is of blue colour, while the complexion of her body is black (shyāmā). (S. T. 61).

On the basis of the Tripura Sundarikalpa Bālā is described in the Śritattvanidhi as sitting on the full bloomed lotus. Her complexion is red like the flower of japākusuma. This girl (bālikā) is holding in her six hands a rosary (akṣa), the śruka, a book (pustaka). Out of the rest of hands two are in the abhiti and vara postures. The emblem of one hand is not mentioned in the text. (S. T. 80).

Thus, this Tāntrika goddess, from the point of view of her emblems seem to be associated with the cult of Brahmā, than the god Śiva, as in the case of other Sundarīs.

The goddess Mṛtsañjīvanī is mentioned as of pacific nature. The text describing her emblems is not clear. In her hands she shows a noose (pāśa), the pose vara ? a goad (aṅkuśa), a mace (gadā), a sword (khaṅga), a trident (śūla) and the last hand is in the abhaya pose. This eight armed goddess is of red colour and sits on a full bloom lotus. (S. T. 82).

The goddess Chandrāparameśvarī is described in the Śritattvanidhi as of golden colour holding a sword and a lotus in her hands. Her lotus eyes are beautiful. (S. T. 98).

Trikaṇṭakīdevī is a very fierce goddess with certain abnormal features. She has a body showing three colours. Her body is black below the navel, red between the navel and the neck and white over the neck. The terrible fangs protruding from her four faces are so long and crooked that they pierce out through her belly. In her four hands she holds two lamps, a conch and a discus (rathāṅgam). She has three eyes. She has also been described as the multi-coloured goddess (chitravarṇā). (S. T. 120).

The goddess Tiraṣkāriṇī is of blue complexion and rides on the back of a horse. She holds a sword in her hand. Her eyes are half closed due to sleepness (nidrānimīlita). (S. T. 94).

The goddess Aśvārūḍhā also rides on the back of a horse. She has two hands holding in them a cane decked with gold (kanakamayīvetrayaṣṭhī) and the braddle (khalinī) of the horse. (S. T. 95).

Śivadūtī is the special form of Durgā and represents the power of Śiva. According to the Bhaviṣya Purāṇa she is also one of the nine Durgās.[66]

The name Śivadūtī is given to the goddess Durgā for making Śiva her messenger in her war with Śumbha and Niśumbha. Her form is described in the Devī Māhātmya as terrible and she troubles the demons with her loud shrieks.[67]

According to the Matsya Purāṇa Śivadūtī has a faded look and emaciated thin wiry body. She has snakes and skull as her ornaments. In her four hands she carries the raktapātra, a sword (khaḍga), śūla and māṅsa. She also keeps a khatvaṅga.[68]

The Śritattvanidhi describes the goddess a bit differently. According to this description her complexion is bright like the midday sun. She has three eyes and eight hands holding in them a vessel of blood (pātra) or gem, a club (gadā), a shield (kheṭaka), a noose (pāśa), the lotus flower (padma), an axe (kuṭhāra), a sword (mahākhaṅga) and a goad (aṅkuśa). She has ornaments of gems. (S. T. 22).

In the chapter of grahanidhi of the Śritattvanidhi there are some terrific goddesses including the names of Ugrā, Jeṣṭhā, Raudrā and Kālī.

Ugrā mounts the bull and has three eyes. Her lustre is like that of fire. Her one hand shows kapāla and the other is in the abhaya pose. (S. T. 496).

Jyeṣṭhā is of pātala varṇa and according to Śritattvanidhi she in one hand shows kapāla and the other vara pose. (S. T. 497)

Some other text quoted by T. A. G. Rao describes her as of red complexion and the eldest of the group of Devīs. She has two hands showing kapāla and a bāṇa instead the vara pose.[69]

Raudrā is of terrific look and black face. She in her two hands hold a skull (kapāla) and a flywhisk (chāmarai). (S. T. 498).

Kālī is described as black like cloud but her face is red like the colour of copper (tāmranibhānanam). She is the destroyer of fear and has two hands holding the kapāla and the kartri. (S. T. 500).

In the same chapter we find the dhyānas of some obscure or local deities; such as Vikīrṇī, kalavikīriṇī, balavikīrinī, balapramathānī, Bhrāmarī and Saṅkaṭā.

Vikīrṇī is of blue colour and holds in her two hands muṇḍa and Śakti. (S. T. 501).

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

Kalavikīrṇī is a goddess of white complexion and the destroyer of poverty (dainyaharā). (S. T. 502).

Balapramathanī is the destroyer of the enemies and has red complexion. In her two hands she holds kapāla and pāśa. (S. T. 504).

Balavikīrṇī is of mixed complexion (chitravarṇa). She is the giver of peace and holds in her two hands kapāla and japamālikā). [S. T. 503].

Bhrāmarī is blue in complexion and has long jaṅgha and the sunken belly (kṛśodari) (S. T. 513).

Saṅkaṭā has a curious form of her neck (grīvā), a low nose and has the sunken belly. She holds in her hands a sword (khaṅga) and a shield (kheṭaka) (S. T. 514).

Ulikikā is a terrific goddess with blue neck and big belly (mahodarī). She holds a daṇḍa in her one of the hands. (S. T. 515).

We have noted above that Rākā and Sinivālī are known from the vedas. They were popular vedic goddesses but later they were forgotten and no where in the purāṇic pantheon or in the iconographic texts they are mentioned. But in the tantropāsanā they had some place. The Rudryāmālā (which is quoted in the Śritattvanidhi) describes them as follows :

Rākā is white like the marble. She rides a corpse (savārudhā) Decked with all kinds of ornaments she in her four hands shows vara and abhaya poses and holds amṛtakalā and amṛtkuṇḍikā. (S. T. 460).

Sinivālī is of black complexion and in her hands she shows the poses of vara and abhaya and hold a rosary (akṣasūtra) and a water pot (kamaṇḍalu). (S. T. 461).

47. Various icons of Gajalakṣmī or Abhiṣeka types of Goddesses have been found. The earliest representations of this goddess have been found in the Śuṅga Art at Bharhut as well as at Sāñchī. The most interesting figure is found on the middle section of the front architrave of the southern gate way of the Great Stupa at Sāñchī. Here the goddess stands on lotus holding in the right hand a lotus, the left being placed on the hip. She is being annoited by two elephants. In several Kuṣāṇa sculptures, the goddess having two hands (left holding a lotus, right in the abhaya pose) are represented. Two elephants sprinkle water on her. She, in another Kuṣāṇa sculpture is shown along with Ardhnāriśvara, Viṣṇu and Kuvera (V. S. Agrawala, Brhmanical Images in Mathura Art, pp. IX and 41 etc.). Gajalākṣmī is also a favourite motif on seals and coins of the Guptas period and also on the coins of Śaṣāṅka (Bhagwat Sahai, Iconography of Minor Hindu aud Buddhist Deities p. 171). Seals from Bhita Vasārh, Rajghat also represent Gajalakṣmī. (A. S. I. A. R. 1903-4. p. 107. Seals nos. 3, 4, 7, 8, 10, 11, 13 etc., M. A. S. I. p. 45 and 51; A. S. I. A. R. 1911-12, pl. XVIII. XIX).

Some of the stone sculptures of Gupta and the early Mediaeval period represent different types of Gajalakṣmī. A Gupta sculpture from Eran (M. P.) shows the Goddess being annoited by a pair of elephants. Indian Araracology, 1960-61, p. 62. t. LXX. IV). Another Gupta figure from Kauśāmbi, in which a pair of elephants giving bath to the Goddess are shown standing as a pair of lotus stalks held by the Goddess. (Ibid., 1956-57, p. 29, pt. XXXVIII.)

In the early Mediaeval architecture, Gajalakṣmī was assingned a special place on the centre of the lintel over the shrine doorways in Orissa, Khajuraho etc. usually sitting an a lotus, crossed legged or in the ardhaparyaṅka pose and being given a bath by two miniature elephants, standing on the lotuses with upturned iars held in their trunks. Iconography of Minor Hindu and Buddhist Deities p. 175-176. Gajalakṣmī figures from Ellora and Mahabalipuram show the popularity of the Goddess in South India (Elements of Hindu Iconography, Vol. I, pt. II. pl. CIX. and CX.)

SHE
THE SLAYER OF THE DEMON AND THE SEVEN MOTHERS

SHE is the mother of gods as well as of demons. But for their wicked acts, the goddess kills the demons, her own sons.

The various epics and the Purāṇas, particularly, the Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa describes her battle against the demons (asuras) in three phases (charitas). In the first, i.e., (pūrvacharita) she fights against Madhu and Kaitabha, in the second (madhyam), she kills mahiṣa. In the third phase (Uttara Charita) she defeats five asuras-Śumbha-Niśumbha, Chaṇḍa-muṇḍa and Raktabīja.

According to the Devī Māhātmya when Madhu and Kaitabha, attempted to kill Brahmā, she as Yoganidrā made Viṣṇu conscious, who was in the state of nidrā, to kill the demons.[1]

The madhyam charita is related with the battle of Mahiṣā, the power of antigods and the symbol of unrestricted wild energy and death.

The Mahiṣa, the leader of the Asuras fought for hundred years with the devas and captured the throne of Indra by defeating and vanquishing the power of the devas. This enraged the great Gods Viṣṇu, Brahmā and Śiva, who in great anger produced the Goddess later known as Mahiṣāsuramardini out of their unified heat (mahāteja). This mahāteja being added and strengthened by the energies and lustre of other gods turned into a pile of light blazing like a mountain whose flames filled the whole space, which later on unified into a single corpus of a beautiful women enveloping the three worlds by her lustre.[2]

Thus, a composite image of the goddess was formed. Earlier Durgās, described above, were the results of the process from one into Many. Now the process was reverse. In the 'Mahiṣāsurākhyāna' the goddess is the result of the process from many into one.

This process has been further illustrated in the Devī Māhātmya.

It is said that the face of this composite goddess as Mahiṣamardinī was produced from the light (teja) of Śiva, her hair from that of yama, her arms from the lustre of Viṣṇu; her breasts from that of moon; her bust from that of Indra; her thighs and legs from that of Varuṇa; her hips from the lustre of the Earth; her feet from that of Brahmā; her fingers of the feet from the lustre of Śūrya; her fingers of the hand from that of Vasus; her nose from that of Kubera; her teeth were formed from the lustre of Prajāpati, her triple eyes were produced from the light of Agni; her eye-brows were the twin twilight (sandhyā); her ears were formed from the lustre of Vāyu.[3]

This goddess Śivā (as called in the Devī Māhātmya) was provided by various gods their own weapons and ornaments. According to this description, Śiva gave his trident; Viṣṇu a chakra; Vāyu a bow and two quivers of arrows, Agni a Śakti, Indra his vajra and the bell of his elephant Airavata, Yama, a rod, the kāladaṇḍa, Varuṇa a noose, and a conch, Prajāpati a garland of beads, Brahmā his pot (kamaṇḍalu) Sūrya the rays, Kāla a shinning sword and a shield. The Milky Ocean gave to her a lustrous necklace and a pair of undecaying garments, a heavenly crest-jewel, ear-rings, bracelets, a brilliant ardha chandra necklace, armlets, a pair of anklets, a torque and finger rings.

Viśvakarmā gave her brilliant battle-axe (paraśu) and an armour, ocean gave her a garland of lotuses for her head.

Himālaya gave her mount, the lion and various jewels. Lord Kubera gave her a drinking cup full of wine and Śesha a Nāgahāra [4]

In this way Simhavāhinī Durgā came into being. She is the killer of the demon Mahiṣa

Her iconographic features are variously described in the respective texts of the Purāṇas as well as in the Śilpa texts. There is slight difference in the mythological versions of the account of Mahiṣāsuramardinī, but so far iconographic details are concerned they are identical except in the description of hands and emblems. Most of the Purāṇas, such as Matsya and Vāmana describe the goddess as Kātyāyinī and the Viṣṇudharmottara Purāṇa describes the goddess as Chaṇḍikā. In the Śritattvanidhi, however, she is named as Chāmuṇḍeśvarī [S. T. 1].

The Vāmana Purāṇa, closely follows the version of Devī Māhātmya of the Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa.[5]

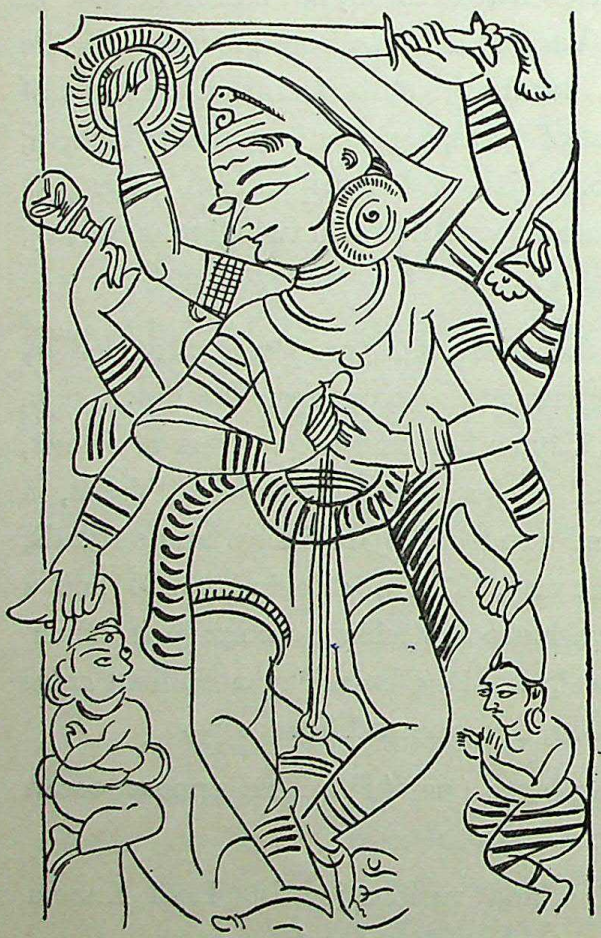

Fig. 14. Chāmuṇḍeśvari
(From the 15th Century Manuscript)
Apabhraṁśa style.

The version of the Vāmana Purāṇa relates that the goddess Kātyāyinī cames forth out of the flames of anger emitted by Viṣṇu, Brahmā and Śiva. This goddess was with three eyes and with eighteen hands. To her Śiva gave a trident, Viṣṇu a disc, Varuṇa a conch, Agni a dart, Yama an iron rod, Vāyu a bow, Śūrya a quiver full of arrows, Indra a thunderbolt, Kubera a mace, Brahmā a rosary and a water pot, Kāla a sword and a shield, Viśvakarmā a battle axe, Himavāna a lion etc.[6]

Thus, while the Devī Māhātmya describes the sixteen weapons of the goddess given by the gods, Vāmana enumerates only fourteen though the hands of the goddess are mentioned as eighteen.

The verson of Matsya Purāṇa[7] is more popular and was followed also in the tradition of imagery as well as in the Śilpa texts, such as the Aparājita-pṛchchā[8] Rūpamaṇḍana[9], Māyādīpikā and the Śilparatna[10] as well as in the

Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa.[11] All these texts describe Kātyāyinī Devi as a ten handed goddess.

According to the Matsya Purāṇa the goddess Kātyāyinī has ten hands and three eyes. Her matted hair (jaṭājūta) are decked with the crescent (ardhendu). Her colour is like the atīsīpuṣpa. She is young and adorned with various ornaments with beautiful teeth and prominent breasts she stands in the tribhaṅga pose. In her right hands she holds a trident, a sword, a discus, the sharp arrows and a spear and in the left a shield, a bow, a noose, a goad and a bell or an axe. Below is to be shown the headless trunk of the buffalo-bodied asura from whose neck his human from is made to emerge with a sword and a shield in his hands. His eyes, hair, and brows are red and he vomits blood from his mouth. His chest is pierced by the trident (triśūla) of the Devi. The lion of the Devi mounts the mahiṣa. The asura is bound down by the nāgapāśa. The Goddess Kātyāyinī rides the lion, her mount, by her right leg and pushes aside the Mahiṣa by the first finger (aṅguṣṭha) of the left leg.

This vivid description of the Matsya Purāṇa is the basis of the description of the goddess Kātyāyinī in all other texts. The differences in the account of the emblems of ten-armed goddess, however, may be noted as follows :

[* It adds Paraśu and Chamara also.]

The Agni Purāṇa presents the description of the goddess Mahiṣamardinī with many hands. The text is not complete hence the emblems and the āyudhas of the hands are not properly enumerated.

The first description is related to the goddess having twenty hands. Their emblems etc. are not fully mentioned. According to this account she holds in her hands a tident (śūla), a sword (asi), a spear (śakti), a discus (chakra), a noose (pāśa), a shield (kheṭa), a kettledrum (damarū), and shows the abhaya pose. This is the description of right hand. In the left hand she holds the nāgapāśa, a shield (kheṭaka), an axe (kuṭhāra), a goad (aṅkuśa), a bow (chāpa), a bell (ghanṭā), a flag (dhvaja), a club (gadā), a mirror (ādarśa), a club (mudgara).

The ten armed Mahiṣamardinī is also referred to here, but the details of the hands etc. are not given.

In another description the goddess is described as having eighteen hands. In the right hands she holds a muṇḍa, a shield (kheṭaka), a mirror (ādarśa), shows the tarjanī pose, a bow (chāpa), a kettledrum (damarū), a noose (pāśa). In the left of her hands she holds a spear (śakti), a club (mudgara), a trident (śūla), a thunder bolt (vajra), a sword (khaṅga), a goad (aṅkuśa), the arrows (sarāṇ), a discus (chakra), and the Śalākā.[12]

In the Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa[13] the goddess Kātyāyinī is described as a four handed goddess showing the abhaya pose, bāṇa or chakra in the right hands and the varada as well as the saṅkha in the left hands.

The Śritattvanidhi refers to Kātyāyinī as one of the Navadurgās without describing the iconographic features, particularly of hands. (S. T. 56).

The goddess Mahiṣamardinī described as Chaṇḍeśvarī in the Śritattva-nidhi is a twenty armed goddess. She has three eyes. Her complexion is of gold (hemābha). She is a very handsome and youthful women with thin waist (kṛśamadhyā) and beautiful high breasts and large eyes. She, sitting on a lion, is in angry mood (kruddhā). In her right hands she holds a trident (śūla), a sword (asi), a spear (śakti), a discus (chakra), an arrow (bāṇa), a conch (śaṅkha), a thunderbolt (pavi) and shows the abhaya posture. In rest of the right hands she has a kettle-drum (damarū) and a knife (churikā). All these āyudhas and posture is to be shown in the urdha-vādhi-krama.

Further it is described in the Śritattva-nidhi that the buffalo part of the beheaded asura is lying but the real asura in human form (pumāna) proceeding forth out of the neck of the buffalo in a very much agitated attitude. But his heart is pierced with the śūla of the goddess due to which the demon's eyes, hair and brows are red with blood and the demon also vomi ts blood from his mouth. In her combat with the demon Mahiṣa her mount the lion takes an active part and attempts to devour the hind part of the demon who is bound with the nāgapāśa by the goddess. The goddess is mounting the lion in the ālīḍha pose. Her left leg is on the lion and right one dashes the Mahiṣa. Her colour is like the colour of gold (svarṇavarṇaḥ).

This account of Chaṇḍeśvarī also occurs in the Nṛsimhaprāsāda. We have noted above that the goddess Mahiṣamardinī is described in the Viṣṇudharmottara Purāṇa. In the Śrītattvanidhi, however there is another dhyāna of Chaṇḍikā, which considerably differs with the above account of Chāmuṇḍeśvarī (=Mahiṣamardinī and Kātyāyinī).

The account of Chaṇḍikā as given in the Śritattvanidhi, Nṛsimhaprāsada[15] and Viṣṇudharmottara Purāṇa is identical. According to the first two texts Chaṇḍikā is of white complexion, of unauspicious look. She rides the lion (simhagā). She has three eyes which are rolled and round. She has three hands. The right hands show the varada pose and hold a trident (śūla) and scissors (kartikā). The left hands hold a noose (pāśa), a vessel (pātra), and the last one show the abhaya pose. (S. T. 50).

The Viṣṇudharmottara Purāṇa, however points out that she mounts the corpse (Śava).[16]

The account of Agni Purāṇa of Chaṇḍikā is close to the Śritattvanidhi. Here it is recommended that the Goddess Chaṇḍikā should be shown with twenty hands, holding a trident (śūla), a sword (asi), a spear (śakti), a discus (chakra), a noose (pāśa), a shield (kheṭa), a kettledrum (damaru), the nāgapāśa, a shield (kheṭa), an axe (kuthāra), a goad (aṅkuśa), a bow (chāpa), a bell (ghaṇṭā), a flag (dhvaja), a club (gadā), a mirror (ādarśa), one more club (mudgara) etc.[17]

Further it is described that the buffalo should be shown below with its head entirely severed and the asura should be sculptured as rushing out of that severed neck foaming with rage and brandishing his sword in the air. The goddess is to be represented in a standing posture with her right foot resting on the back of the lion and her left foot on the shoulders of the demon, round whose neck is twisted the serpent noose of the goddess and who is pounced upon by her celestial lion. This image of Chaṇḍikā is to be made as possessing three eyes fully armed and crushing the enemy of Gods.

The description of Chaṇḍikā as given in the Rūpamaṇḍana represents entirely a different concept about the goddess. Here the goddess as distinct from Kātyāyinī[13] is described as one having fierce features (krūrarūpā). The same goddess who has killed Mahiṣāsura, when kills Chaṇḍa and Muṇḍa,

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

(Chaṇḍamuṇḍabighātinī) is a sixteen armed goddess instead the ten or twenty. She holds in her sixteen hands a trident (triśūla), a shiled (kheṭaka), a sword (khaṅga), a bow (dhanu), a noose (pāśa), a goad (aṅkuśa), an arrow (bāṇa), an axe (kuthāra), a mirror (darpaṇa), a bell (ghaṇṭā), a conch (śaṅkha), the vastra, a club (gadā), a thunderbolt (vajra) and a club (mudgara).

This fierce goddess has the hair of yellow colour (pingakeśā). With shunken belly (kṛśodarī). She wears the skin of lion (vyāghra charma) and ornaments of śnakes (bhujaṅga). She also wears the garland of skull (kapāla). She is of black complexion and rides on the corpse (śavārūḍhā).[19]

The depiction of Mahiṣamardinī is a facinating theme of Indian imagery, mostly since the Kuṣāṇa period, if not earlier.[20] The earliest representation of the goddess is with two hands. With right hand she is shown plunging the trident or spear into the body of the buffalo and with left hand she holds the tail of the demon buffalo. She is shown with or without the lion. In same examples of the Kuṣāṇa period from Mathurā, the goddess is shown standing against the buffalo, who is alawys represented in the animal form combating the goddess with its head lifted up.

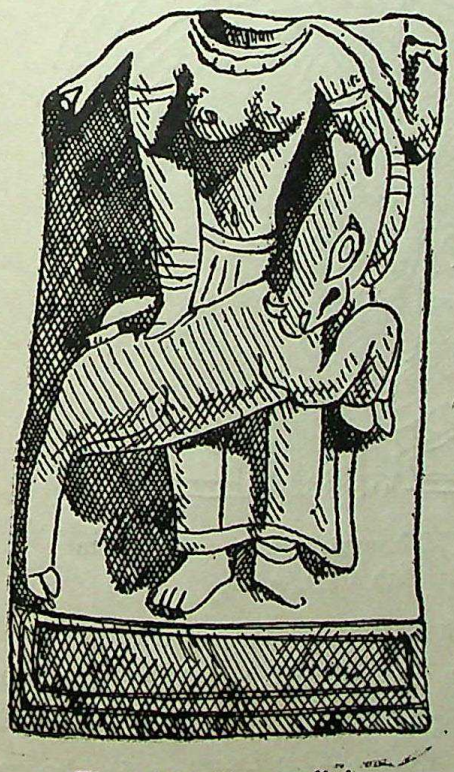

Fig. 16 Mahiṣamardini
Kuṣāṇa period, Mathurā

The Kuṣāṇa examples of Mahiṣamardinī also includes the images of the goddess with four or six arms. In one of the Mathurā examples, the six armed goddess is shown holding the crown with two hands, the animal with other two and a spear and a trident in remaining two hands.[12] It is remarkable that in the Kuṣāna period in none of the examples the throat of the demon Mahiṣa is shown severed, as recommended by the

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

Purāṇic texts. The demon is also not shown in human form coming out of the cut throat of the buffalo. This is a feature, which became popular in the Gupta period,[22] and onward as known from the examples of Bhita, Bhumara, Udaigiri etc.

The Gupta artist followed old tradition of depicting the goddess Mahiṣamardinī with two, four and six arms and also introduced the new feature of representing the goddess with twelve hands. A two armed Mahiṣā-sura plaque from Bhita is known from the Gupta period. It this the goddess is not shown accompanied by her mount. She has placed her left hand on the waist and holding a trident in her right hand. She is piercing the demon in animal form.[23] In Bhumra example the four armed goddess is shown pressing the demon's head and lifting the hind part of the demon by its tail with her left hand. In rest of two (back) hands she holds a sword and a shield.[24]

The twelve armed goddess killing the Mahiṣa is known from Udaigiri (Bhilsa). This is a relief carved on the facade of the Chandragupta II Cave. The mode of attacking the Mahiṣa by the goddess as depicted here remarkably tallies with the description in the Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa,[25]

In the early Mediaeval imagery the ten armed Mahiṣāsuramardinī was more common than two, six, four, twelve, eighteen, or twenty armed goddess. Such images have been found from all parts of India—particularly from Bengal, Bihar, Assam, Rajasthan etc. A ten armed image of the goddess Mahiṣamardinī from Dulmi, (Manabhum) is vigorous and corresponds with the texts describing the goddess Chaṇḍikā, or Kātyāyinī. Crushing the demon with the left leg, right planting on the lion, her mount, she pierces the shoulder of the demon with a trident. She holds in the right hands a trident, a shield, the taṅkā, the arrows and a sword. In her left hands she shows a bow, an axe, a goad, and the nāgapāśa and the suchi pose. The two armed demon emerging out of the buffalo has still her leg within the trunk of the animal below which lies the severed head. The demon is carrying a sword and shield in his hands.[26]

This image fairly represents the Vaṅga style of Mahiṣamardinī, the tradition of which, more or less continues till the present day.

In some of the Mahiṣamardinī images from Rajasthan the style is slightly different. In Rajasthani Mahiṣamardinī image, the headless demon is not so lifeless and lying on the ground as the vaṅga style. Here, as is shown in the example of Mahiṣamardinī on the Nīlakaṇṭheśvarī temple, Alwar, and the image found from Abneri, now in the Amer Museum Jaipur, the headless trunk of the buffalo demon, though pierced with the trident of the goddess, shown running with spirit to dash against the goddess Mahiṣamardinī.[27]

The eight armed Mahiṣamardinī was also commonly sculptured in different parts of the goddess in a novel way. In the Vaital Deul, Bhuvaneśvara, the buffalo demon is shown with the body of a man and the head of a buffalo, who is kneeling before the goddess at her feet, trying to attack the dynamic goddess with a sword. The goddess is standing by planting her left foot on the back of the lion with right she pushes the shoulder of the demon. In her eight hands she holds a sword, a trident, a thunderbolt, a lance, a shield,

a bow, and the nāgapāśa. The significant point of this image is that though she is fighting emphatically with the demon, her face is calm and peaceful.[28]

From Sirpur (M. P.) an image of eight handed Mahiṣamardinī belonging to the 7th century is interesting from the point of view of difference that instead the goddess planting one of her legs on the back of the demon, she is trampling upon the demon with both the legs. The defeated demon is turned upside down.[29]

From Khajuraho the goddess having six and eight hands have been noticed with usual weapons.[30]

Entirely unsupported by any text, the image of the goddess from Betna, Dinajpur represents with thirty two hands with different weapons, symbols and poses.[31]

Fig. 19. The Goddess on the Demans scvered head. Mahabalipuram

Some of the Mahiṣmardinī images from Bādāmī, Aihole, Canjeevaram Gaṅgaikondcholapuram etc. follow the textual tradition of the Purāṇas while representing the goddess. The lion figures in the Chālakyan images of the Mahiṣmardinī images are lifeless and inactive.[32] But the Pallava artists certainly superseeded in imagination and have represented the goddess sometimes in a most simple manner, and sometimes in a most complicated composition In either case they have considerably deviated from the textual dictates. While representing the goddess in the former style, she is shown standing on the severed head of the demon Mahiṣa. She shows four hands. This example is from the Draupadi Rath, Mahabalipuram. In this image main right hand is in the abhaya pose and the left is on the kaṭi, the upper hands show a conch and a discus. At the ame place, the goddess is respresented in the same style on the severed head of the buffalo with eight hands also. Likewise the upper two hands, show the discus and conch. The other weapons are, the sword and the bell in the right hands and a bow and a shield in the left hands. The same tradition continues from Mahabalipuram to Srimusham and Tanjavur also. The latter figure, however, shows only four hands.[33]

Among the complicated figures, the representation of the goddess fighting with the demon in the Mahisamardini Cave, Mahabalīpuram is monumental and epic in itself.[34] It is not a worshipper's image but a story telling relief, visualising and depicting the great battle with realistic movements and actions of considerable animation. Rarely has this legend been visualized in stone—with such power, skill and dramatic effect.[35]

In this figure the goddess is shown eight armed, riding on her lion, equipped with all kinds of weapons and using the bow with its string pulled up to her ear. She is attended by a hosts of gaṇas and yoginis and is in the warlike ālīḍha posture using a huge club. The umbrellas held over the vanquished and the victor are very suggestive. The contours of the Mahiṣa demon have been powerfully delineated and the battle scene is full of animation. The enthusiasm of the gaṇas and the dispirited attitude of the Asura is delightfully contrasted.[6]

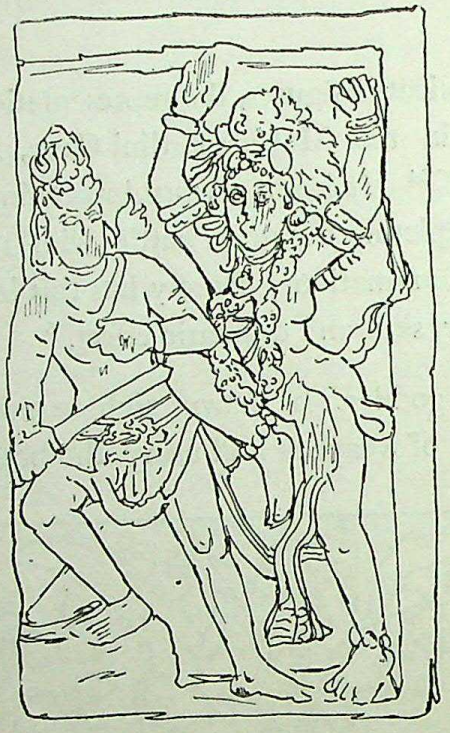

Fig. 21.
The Goddess engaged in dual with the Demon.
Mahabalipuram

Yet another image of the goddess fighting with the Asura, from Mahabalipuram, now in the National Museum, is certainly an advance over all imaginations and delineation of the theme. Here the goddess is shown without her mount and engaged in duel with the demon with remarkable vigour and energy. She, the two armed goddess, attacks the demon with her both the hands raised over. The demon is shown entirely in the human body with a sword in the right hand.

But the goddess is shown without any weapon. Her fury is clearly made explicit by her dishevelled hairs. Her angry and furious mood makes the demon frightned who has shown as trying to scape fram the battle field.

THE SEVEN MOTHERS

There are a number of mythologies relating to the origin of the Seven Mothers. The Varāha Purāṇa relates the origin of the Seven Mothers with the Śivas fighting with the Andhakāsura who was endowed with the power of multiplying into many secondary demons of equal strength and vigour than his primary self if his blood oozing from the wounds of his body fall on the ground. According to the version of this story the god Śiva created out of the flame that was issuing from the mouth, a Śakti called Yogeśvarī to stop the blood from falling on the ground. Besides Yogeśvarī Śiva created another Śakti named Māheśvarī. Likewise, Brahmā, Indra, Varāha, Viṣṇu, Kumāra Yama also presented their Śaktis to assist Śiva against Andhakāsura. All these Mātrikās known as Brahmāṇī, Māheśvarī, Kaumārī, Vaiṣṇavī, Vārāhī, Indrāṇī and Chāmuṇḍā were to lick the blood of Andhakāsura before it falls on the ground from his wound caused by the blow of Śiva.[37]

According to this list of the Varāha Purāṇa the Mātrikās are eight including the name of Yogeśvarī. But in the other lists of the Aṣṭamātrikas, instead the name of Yogeśvarī, the name of Nāraśimhī is included. In the Śritattvanidhi, however, instead Yogeśvarī or Nārasimhī, the name of Mahālakṣmī is presented in the list of the Aṣṭamātrikās along with the other seven Mātrikās, named as Brāhmī, Māheśvarī, Kaumārī, Vaiṣṇavī, Vārāhī, Māhendrī and Chāmuṇḍā. (S. T. 7).

The Devī Māhātmya[38] connects the origin of the Mātrikās with the fight of Devī Chaṇḍikā or Ambikā with the demon Śumbha and Raktavīja. Functionally, their role in this struggle was slightly different than those of the Mātrikās who share the war of Śiva with Andhakāsura. According to the Varāha Purana, all the Mātrikās were employed to lick the bloodoozing from the body of the demon Andhakāsura. But in the Devī Māhātmya this role is singularly specified to Chāmuṇḍā. The other Mātrikās take active role in fighting with the demon Raktavīja, the commander of Śumbha. Like Andhakāsura, Raktavīja also had the characterstic of multiplying into many secondary demons alike himself upon the falling of the blood from his body.

According to the version of the Suprabhedāgama[39] the origin of the

Mātrikās is assigned to Brahmā who employed them in his conflict against Naiṛta.

While the aniquity of the images of the Mātrikas goes back to the Kuṣāṇa period[40], they are mentioned in Gaṅgādhara inscription of Kumārgupta I. In this inscription the names of the Mātrikas are not specified. An inscription of Skandagupta, the Mātrikas are associated with Kārtikeya. The number is seven but the names of the Mātrikas did not occur in any early Chalukyan inscription. Commenting on Varāhmihira, probably for the first time their names are mentioned by Utpola, the commentator of the Bṛhatsaṁhitā. He, however, gives the names of the Mātrikas, more than seven. They are Brāhmī Vaiṣṇavī, Raudrī (Māheśvarī), Kaumārī, Āindrī, Yamī, Vāruṇī and Kāuberī, besides the names of Nārasiṁhī, Vārahī and Vaināyakī. Further in othertexts, the list is sometimes raised to include the names and the number of the Mātrikas to sixteen.

The Śritattvanidhi approves on two occasions the same list of the Mātrikās including the same seven names in the same order. It recommends two ways of representing these Mātrikās. In one form they should be shown in the red garments (raktavasasaḥ) with two hands holding in them a skull (kapāla) and a lotus (utpala). (S. T. 7.)

Alternatively they should be presented according to the form (ākāra) along with the similar (sadṛsāyuddhas) of their own respective gods creating them. For example, Brahmāṇī should be shown according to the form of Brahmā, holding similar emblems and weapons as well as the symbols common to Brahmā. Similarly the other Mātrikas should also be represented. All are of red colour (raktavarṇaḥ). (S. T. 7).

This form of representing the goddesses is commonly recommended in other texts also.

Thus, according to the Suprabhedāgama[41] it is recommended that Brahmāṇī should be sculptured like Brahmā; Māheśvarī like Māheśvara, Vaiṣṇavī like Viṣṇu; Vārāhī as a short women with an angry face and holding a plough as her weapon; Indrāṇi like Indra; the Chāmuṇḍā as a terrific women. This last goddess should have her hair in a dishevelled condition, should possess a dark complexion and have four hands; she should wield the triśūla in one of her hands and carry a kapāla in the other. All the Mātrikas are to be shown seated and should have two of her hands in the varada and the abhaya poses, while the other two hands should carry weapons appropriate to their male counterparts. They should be shown seated, upon padmāsanas.

In the Devī Māhātmya[42] the process of formation of these Mātrikās are elaborately described. It is said that from the bodies of Brahmā, Śiva, Kārtikeya, Viṣṇu and Indra, their śaktis approached Chaṇḍikā to fight with the Asuras. in the form of their own gods.

Further, it is described that in an aerial car (vimāna) borne by haṁsās came out the Śakti of Brahmā holding a rosary (akṣasūtra) and a water pot (kamaṇḍalu). She is called Brahmāṇī.

Śiva's Śakti Māheśvarī came seated on a bull holding a fine trident wearing bracelets of the great serpent and adorned with a streak of the moon (chandrarekhā).

Ambikā in the form of Kaumārī assuming the form of Kārtikeya came out to fight the Asuras, holding a spear (śakti) in hand and riding on an excellent peacock (mayuravaravāhanā).

Likewise Vaiṣṇavī the Śakti of Viṣṇu, seated on a Garuḍa came out, holding in her hand a conch (śaṅkha), discus (chakra), a mace (gadā), a bow (sāraṅga), a sword (khaḍga).

The Śakti of Hari called Vārāhī assuming the matchless form of Hari as Yajñavarāha also advanced.

Nārasiṁhī arrived there assuming the form of Narsimha, throwing down the clusters of constellations by the shaking of her manes.

Likewise Āindrī holding a thunderbolt and seated on the lord of elephants (gajrajoparisthithā) arrived. She is thousand eyed appearing just like Indra.

Beside these Seven Mātrikās it is stated in the Devī Māhātmya that the goddess herself issued forth her Śakti called Sivadūtī to take her share in battle against the Daitya Śumbha.

This goddess whose iconographic features we have noted above (p. 54) did broke the spirit of the Daityas by her violent laughter. Hearing the loud laughter of the goddess when the Asuras fell on the ground, the goddess 'Śivadūtī' devoured them in the battle field.[43]

The Mātrikās, however, fought with the demons with their weapons etc. Thus, as it is described in the Devī Māhātmya that Brāhmī destroyed the Asuras by sprinkling water on them from his kamaṇḍalu, Māheśvarī killed the demons by her trident, Vaiṣṇavī by her chakra, Kaumarī by her javelin (śakti) and Āindrī by her thunderbolt. Vārāhī, besides using her chakra, shattered the Asuras with the blows of her snout and wounded them in the chest by her pointed tusk. Nārsimhī, did not use any weapon and torned the enemies by her claws and frightened them with her roar.

It is to be pointed out here that Chāmuṇḍā is not included in the Mātrikā-list of the Devī Māhātmya. These Mātrikās also do not perform similar role of preventing the falling of the blood from the Daitya Raktavīja as was in the case of Andhakāsura legend. Here this special role of licking the blood of the Asura, before it fall on the ground was assigned to Chāmuṇḍā only, who is included in both the lists of the Mātrikās in the Śrītattvanidhi. She is also called Yamī.

It is said that due to the blows of the Mātrikās blood began to fall on the ground and thus causing thousands of secondary Raktavījas, the great goddess Chaṇḍikā asked Chāmuṇḍā to open her wide mouth and lick the blood produced from the blows of her weapons and also to devour the secondary Asuras springing from Raktavīja.[44]

The goddess Chāmuṇḍā did accordingly. When blood flew profusely from the striken body of Raktavīja, Chāmuṇḍā licked it with her mouth in every direction and swallowed the Asuras born from the flow of the blood and at the same time drank the blood which flowed from their bodies. In this way she made the demon Raktavīja bloodless and thus hit by the goddess Chaṇḍikā the Asura Raktavīja fell on the ground.[45]

It is to be noted that the images of the Mātrikās are not represented engaged in fighting with the demons. They are always shown peacefully sitting with their usual emblems and weapons and occasionally with a child in the lap also. This feature emphasises the mother aspect of these goddesses and connects them with the age long tradition of Universal Mother Goddess represented since the pre-historic times and worshipped all over.

The individual features of these Mātrikās are described in the Śrītattva-nidhi as follows :—

Brahmāṇī, the first of the Mātrikās is of golden (yellow) colour and has four faces. She has six hands. In the right three hands, she shows the posture of vara and holds a rosary (sūtra), and the śruvā. In the left hands she holds a book (pustaka) aud kuṇḍī and shows the posture of abhaya. She adorns herself with ornaments and wears the skin of dear as uttarīya. She rides on a goose (haṁśa). (S. T. 43.)

This description of the Mātrikā is more or less the same as in the Viṣṇu-dharmottara and the Matsya Purāṇas.[46]

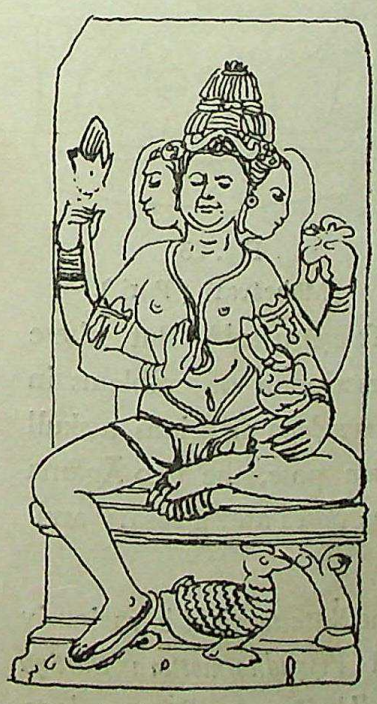

Fig. 22
Brāhmī, (Puri.)

The Rūpamaṇḍana and the Aṁśumadbhedāgam recommend only four hands for this goddess. But there is a considerable difference in the description of the emblems in the hands.

Thus, the Rūpamaṇḍana does not refer the number of the faces of Brahmāṇī but mentions the four hands holding a rosary (akṣasūtra), a waterpot (kamaṇḍalu), the śruvā and a book (pustaka).[47] The Aṁśumadbhedāgama[48] recommends that Brahmāṇī should be shown with four faces (chaturvakra) and with four hands. The right hands should show the abhaya posture and hold a śūla. The left hands be in the varada pose and hold a rosary (akṣa-mālikā). She should sit on the red lotus. Her mount be also shown, which is a goose (haṁsa). The haṁsa is also represented on her banner (ketu). She wears an yellow garment (pītāmbara) and has head adorned with a karaṇḍa makuṭa. Her situation is under a palāśa tree. In some of the South Indian images this trait is shown.

Māheśvarī, the second Mātrikā in the Śrītattvanidhi has a bull as her mount. According to this text she has five faces, three eyes and ten hands. In the right hands she has a sword (khaṅga), the thunderbolt (vajra), a trident (triśūla), a battle axe (paraśu) and the abhaya pose and in the left hands she shows the pose vara and the emblems, a noose (pāśa), a bell (ghaṇṭā), a serpent (nāga) and a goad (aṅkuśa). She has a crescent (chandrarekhā) over her head and has white complexion. (S. T. 44.)

Māheśvarī, (Puri).

According to the Viṣṇudharmottara Purāṇa,[49] she has six hands and five faces and mounts the bull. In the right hands she shows the varada pose and holds a rosary (sūtra) and a kettle-drum (ḍamaru). In the left hands she has a trident (śūla), a bell (ghaṇṭā) and shows the abhaya pose.

As a four armed Mātrikā, she has been described in a number of texts such as Rūpamaṇḍana, Matsya Purāṇa, Aṁśumadbhed āgama and Pūrva-Karaṇāgama.[50] But these accounts are not uniform from the point of the description of emblems in the four hands of the Mātrikā. Thus, while the Rūpamaṇḍana mentions, a skull (kapāla), a trident (śūla), a khatvāṇga and the varada pose, the two Āgama tests with slight variations mention the vara and abhaya poses and a rosary and a trident in her hands.

The Mātrikā Kaumārī, the third of the list of the Śrītattvanidhi is variously described in various texts. Thus, while this text and Viṣṇudharmottara Purāṇa recommends twelve hands (ravivāhu) the Aṁśumadbhedāgama, Rūpamaṇḍana, Karṇāgama only four hands.

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

The twelve armed Mātrikā Kaumārī, as described in the Śrītattvanidhi, has six faces and of pāṭala-varṇā. In one of her right hands she shows the varada pose and in the rest she holds a spear (śakti), a flag (patākā), a staff (daṇḍa), a pot (pātra) and an arrow (bāṇa). Similarly, one of the left hands is in the abhaya pose and the rest of her hands show a bow (chāpa), a bell (ghāṇṭa), a lotus (kamala), a cock (kukkuṭa) and a battle-axe (paraśu). (S. T. 45).

Kumārī (Purī)

The Aṁśumadbhedāgama describes her with four hands and three eyes clad in red garments. Her emblem as well as mount is recommended to be a peacock (mayūra) and her two hands should be shown in the varada and the abhaya poses and with a spear (śakti) and a cock (kukkuṭa). The Pūrva karṇāgama describes her similarly but instead a cock it mentions an aṅkuśa in one of her hands.

According to the Rūpamaṇḍana in three hands of the Mātrikā śūla, śakti and gadā should be shown. The fourth hand is not described. Probably this hand is in the varada pose.[51]

The fourth Mātrikā of the Śrītattvanidhi list is Vaiṣṇavī. She is described as the Mātrikā with six hands showing in one of the right hands the pose varada and holding a club (gadā) and a lotus (aṁbuja). The two of her left hands hold a conch (śaṁkha), a discus (chakra) and the last one should be in the abhaya pose. Her mount is garuḍa. She is of blue complexion and wears a vanamālā. (S. T. 46).

Fig. 25
Vaiṣṇavī (Purī)

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

This account agrees with the description of the Viṣṇudharmottara Purāṇa.[52] Some other texts describe Vaiṣṇavī as having four hands. Thus, according to the Aṁśumadbhedāgama, she in her four hands shows a conch (śaṅkha) and a discus (chakra) and the varada and the abhaya poses.[53] According to the Devī Purāṇa her hands show the emblems of Viṣṇu i.e., a conch (śaṅkha), discus (chakra), a club (gadā) and a lotus (aṁbuja). The same is the description of the Pūrva-karṇāgama.[54] But according to the Rūpamaṇḍana, besides the, Śaṁkha chakra and gadā weapons her one of the hands should also show the varada pose.[55]

Vārāhī, the fifth Mātrikā, according to the Śrītattvanidhi is of black complexion (kṛṣṇa-varṇā). She is of big belly (mahodari) and mounts the buffallo (mahiṣasthā). She has six hands. The right hands show the vara pose and a staff (daṇḍa) and a sword (khaṅga). The left hands hold a shield (kheṭa) and a pot (pātra) and show the abhaya pose. Her face is like a boar (sūkaraśyā). (S. T. 47).

Fig. 26
Vārāhī (Purī)

Three more forms of Vārāhī are described in the 'Śrītattvanidhi'. They are Daṇḍanāthāvārāhī, Svapnavārāhī and Śuddhavārāhī.

Daṇḍanāthāvārāhī is of golden complexion and her face is like a boar. She shows in her hands a conch (śaṅkha), a discus (chakra), the abhaya and the vara poses, a plough (hala), a pestle (mūśala), a noose (pāśa) and a goad (aṅkuśa). Further, in this text she is also has been described as holding a staff in one of her hands (daṇḍanī). (S. T. 75).

The goddess Svapnavārāhī is having the colour of cloud (megh-syāma-varṇaḥ), and three eyes. She bears a crescent on her head. In her hands she shows a sword (asi), a shield (charma), a noose (pāśa), a sickle (śṛṇi) and the vara and the abhaya poses. (S. T. 76.)

Śuddhavārāhī is of blue colour and like other Vārāhīs she also bears the crescent over her head. She has her face like a boar with white protruding teeth. In her four hands she holds a trident (śūla), a skull (kapāla), a pestle (muśala), and a serpent (nāga). (S. T. 77.)

This account is based on the Viṣṇudharmottara Purāṇa.[56]

The sixth Mātrikā, Indrāṇī, is of golden colour (kanakavarṇaḥ) and rides on an elephant. She is of mild (saumya) nature. In her three right hands she shows the varada pose a rosary (sūtra) and the thunderbolt (vajra). One of the left hands is in the abhaya pose and the rest two hold a lotus (kamala) and a pot (pātra). She is described as having a thousand eyes (sahasradṛk). (S. T. 48.)

In the Viṣṇudharmottara Purāṇa the account of this Mātrikā is the same as above. But instead a lotus in one of the left hands, as described in the Śrītattvanidhi, this text recommends a kalaśa.[57]

Fig. 27 Indrāṇī (Purī)

According to the Aṁśumadbhedāgama, Indrāṇī is having four hands in which she shows the varada and the abhaya poses and in rest of the two hands she holds a spear (śakti) and a thunderbolt (vajra). Her emblem as well as the mount is an elephant (gaja). Her complexion is red and has only three eyes.[58]

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

The Pūrvakaraṇāgama also describes the Mātrikā with four hands holding a vajra and śakti and showing the poses of two hands varada and abhaya. According to this text Indrāṇī should be shown with two eyes only. The Rūpamaṇḍana does not mention the number of eyes. But it recommends that the Mātrikā should be shown with many eyes (lochanerbahubhiḥ). It mentions the emblem of the Mātrikā as a thunderbolt (vajra), a spear (śūla) and a mace (gadā). The emblem or the pose of the fourth hand is not described. But as it is said in the text that Indrāṇī is similar in features to Indra, the fourth hand of the Mātrikā should show either in the vara pose or with the emblems such as a goad (aṅkuśa) or a kuṇḍi.[59]

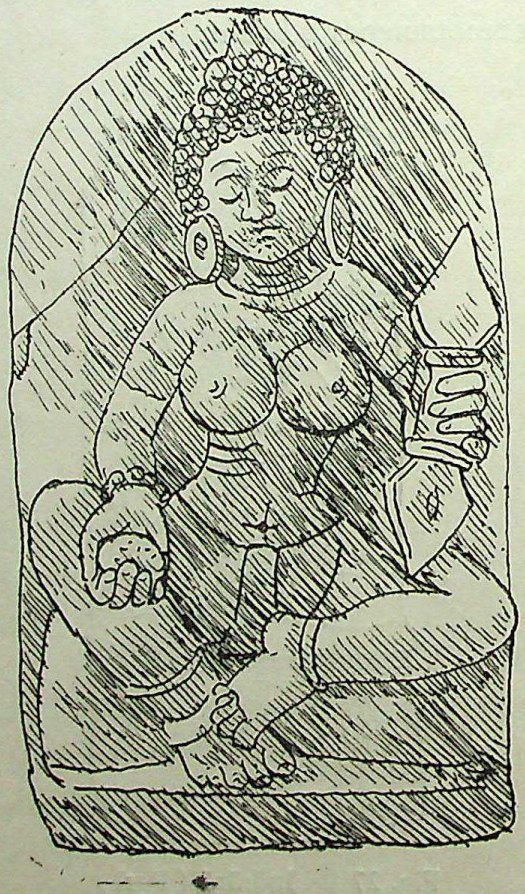

Fig. 28. Indrāṇī Vāranasi, 6th. Cent. A. D.

The Devī Purāṇa describes the goddess as having only two which show a goad (aṅkuśa) and a thunderbolt (vajra).

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

The Śrītattvanidhi describes this Mātrikā separately under the name Indrākṣī, on the basis of the Indrākṣikalpa. According to this description the goddess has only two hands. The right hand is in the varada pose and the left holds a thunderbolt (vajra). She garbs herself in yellow garment and her complexion is also yellow and decked with various ornaments. She is accompanied by a number of damsels. (S. T. 96).

According to the Śrītattvanidhi Chāmuṇḍā, the seventh of the Mātrikās, is of black complexion and of dreadful look. Her mount is the dead body of a human being (pretagā) and adorns herself with the snakes (ahibhūṣaṇā). Her tusks are powerful, the body is emaciated, belly thin and empty and the eyes are sunken. She has power to assume form according to her wishes (kāmarūpiṇī). She has ten hands (digvāhu). In her five right hands she has the pestle (mūśala), discus (chakra), flywhisk (chāmara), a goad (aṅkuśa) and a sword (khaṅga). The Viṣṇudharmottara Purāṇa recommends instead the chakra and chāmara, the kavacha and bāṇa. In the left hands she holds a shield (kheṭa), a noose (pāśa), a bow (dhanu), a staff (daṇḍa) and an axe (kuthāra). (S. T. 49).

Chāmuṇḍā (Jaipur)

According to the Viṣnudharmottara Purāṇa, her complexion is red. The description of the Rūpamaṇḍana of Chāmuṇḍā totally tallies with the Śrītattvanidhi with the exception that in one of the right hands she has been recommended to show mārjani[60] instead the chāmara.

The Devī Māhātmya describes Chāmuṇḍā as of two hands holding a sword (asi) and a noose (pāśa).[61]

In the Āgama texts, however, this Mātrikā is described with four hands. So far her general features are concerned, she is described as having three eyes and of red complexion. Her hair is abundant and thick and bristles upwards.

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

According to the Aṁśumadbhedāgama her hands hold a skull (kapāla) or a trident (śūla) and show the varada and the abhaya poses. But according to the Pūrvakaṇṇāgama her left hands hold a kapāla full of flesh, and fire. In the right hand she holds a snake. The remaining hand is not described.[62]

The Aṁśumdbhedāgama describes her seat a lotus (padmapīthoparisthitā) while the Pūrvakaṇṇāgama mentions an owl to be her mount (rasikarohini) alternately with a corpse (savārūḍhā). It also adds that her flag represents an eagle (gṛdhraketuka).[63]

In the grahanidhi of the Śrītattvanidhi there is another list of the Mātrikās where their mount and colour is particularly mentioned. Here it also specifically indicate that for what particular aspect of prosperity they should be meditated. Thus, Brāhmī who is of kanaka varṇaḥ should be meditated for saubhāgya and youth. She rides on a swan. Māheśvarī who adorns her head with a moon is of white complexion should be meditated for glory (śreyo) and prosperity (vṛdhi). Kaumārī, who rides on a peacock (sadāsukāruḍhā) should be meditated for satisfaction (toṣa). The Mātrikā Vaiṣṇavī is noted for prosperity in grains (vahudhānya). Vārāhī provides pleasure (harṣa). Indrāṇī rides on a bull (vṛṣāruḍhā) and is of golden colour. She is to be meditated for valour (vikrama). Chāmuṇḍā also rides a bull (vṛṣaruḍhā) and destroys the family of the demons (daitya-kulavidhvanśakāriṇim). (S. T. 101–107.)

The Mātrikās are represented in two ways i.e., either collectively on Mātrikā-paṭṭa or individually seated on a separate throne or āsana. The earliest way of representing the Mātrikā is on the Mātrikāpaṭṭa. A number of examples of such Mātrikā-paṭṭas are known from the Kuṣāṇa period from Mathura. In such paṭṭas the Mātrikās numbering seven or six do not show their distinctive iconographic features. They are represented either in standing or sitting positions showing one hand in the abhaya pose and the other holding a pot or holding a child. The remarkable feature of these Mātṛikā-paṭṭas are that mostly they are shown with the Ayudhapuraṣa, flanking the Mātrikās. Occasionally they also show a child held by them.

At Mathura itself we also get Mātrikās on a paṭṭa showing their distinctive features. Thus, Brahmāṇī on this paṭṭa is shown with three (or four) faces holding a laddle (śruka) in her right hand. Her mount swan (haṁsa) is also shown. Similarly, Māheśvarī, Kaumārī, Vaiṣṇavī, Vārāhī and Indrāṇī is also shown with their known emblems such as a trident, a spear, a mace, a broken staff and a vajra (?) respectively. Their respective mounts such as bull, peacock, Garuḍa, mahiṣa and an elephant are also represented. The Mātrikā Chāmuṇḍā on this paṭṭa can be recognised by her emaciated body and sunken belly.

Orissan art presents the Mātrikās on the Parameśvara, Mukeśvara and Vaitala deul temples in a developed form along with Gaṇeśa and Vīrabhadra. The individual forms of the Mātrikās show some common traits, but they also indicate some of the features not commonly known from the texts. For examples, Chāmuṇḍā on the Parameśvara temple holds a lily flower and a vījapūraka besides a trident or a vase. Her vehicle instead a corpse (preta) is an owl. Vārāhī holds a lotus and a fish, which shows a tantric influence on the iconography of the Orissan art in relation to Vārāhī. Vaiṣṇavī, Kumārī, Indrāṇī and Brahmāṇī show a vase or a vījapūraka along with their recommended emblem such as chakra, śakti, vajra and akṣa. All these Mātrikās are shown here with four hands. The Mātrikās on the Mukteśvara temple are shown with a child, except the figure of Chāmuṇḍā. The Mātrikā at Vaitāla deul are shown seated on Yogāsana. In most cases the Mātrikā figures from Bhuvaneśvara are represented with their respective mounts.[64]

An interesting paṭṭa representing two Mātrikās from Gurgi (Rewa, M. P.) now in the Allahabad Museum is worth noting. Here the Mātrikās along with Gaṇeśa and Vīrabhadra are shown dancing. The Matrikas hold a baby along with their usual emblems and the mounts.[65]

Separate images of these Mātrikās are also found. Besides certain artistic features they represent normally the same iconographic traits as found in the Mātrikā-paṭṭas. More known figures are from Seraikela (Singbhum, now in the Patna Museum) Jaipur and Puri. Mostly these figures are four armed figures holding a child also. Sometimes the child is shown in the pedestal. The mount of the Mātrikās are also represented symbolically on the pedestal of the figures of the Mārtikā. The Mātrikās normally are seated in the ardhaparyaṅka pose on a couch with one of the legs pendent and the other tucked upon the seat. The Puri figures, besides showing their normal attributes in the hands also show the vyakhyāna or abhaya poses.[66]

The figure of Nārasimhī from Satna (M. P.), however is of special significance. It represents this Mātrikā with eight arms. Similarly the figure of the same Mātrikā is also known from Badasai (Mayurbhañja). This also shows Nārasiṁhī with eight hands holding a bell, a sword, a mace, a thunder bolt, a shield and a noose. Her two hands (one right and the other left) are in the abhaya and the varada poses respectively.[67] quoted in the Elements of Hindu Iconography, Vol. I. Pt. II. pp. 146–47.

51. According to the Aṁśumadbhedāgama Kaumari is चतुर्भुजा and त्रिनेत्रा. She is described as शक्तिकुक्कुटहस्ता च वरदाभयपाणिनी and मयूरध्वजवाही। The Pūrvakārṇāgama describes her शक्तिकाकुंशधारिणी and वरदाभयहस्ता। According to the Rūpamaṇḍana she is

कुमाररूपा कौमारी मयूरवरवाहना।
रक्तवस्त्रधरा तद्वच्छूलशक्तिगदाधरा॥ (V. 65)

But the Viṣṇudharmottara quoted by Rao describes her diffently.

56. Quoted in the Elements of Hindu Iconography, Vol. II. Pt. I. p. 150. The other texts also quoted in ibid., Vol. I. pt. II. pp. 150–151 describe the Goddess as of four armed. Thus Aṁśumadbhedāgama describes her emblems :

हलं च वरदं सव्ये वामे अभयशक्तिके।
कल्पद्रुमं समाश्रित्य गजध्वजसवाहिनीम्॥

The Pūrvakarṇāgama instead the śakti suggests mūsala.

सव्येऽभयं हलं चैव मूसलं वरदमन्यके।
वराहवक्त्री वाराही यमभूषणभूषणी॥

Rūpamaṇḍana (V. 67–68) however suggests altogether a different feature for her. According to this text :

वाराहीं तु प्रवक्ष्यामि महिषोपरिसंस्थिताम्।
वराहसदृशी घण्टानादा चामरधारिणी॥
गदाचक्रधरा तद्वद्दानवेन्द्रविघातिनी।

SAKTI—THE SPOUSE

Śakti as the Eternal Energy is Mahālakṣmī. She as Great Mother is Ambikā. As spouse of the triad gods—Brahmā, Viṣṇu and Śiva is Sarasvatī, Lakṣmī and Gaurī. In this aspect she helps their male counterparts in creation, preservation and the destruction of the universe.

The spouse (patnī) of Brahmā, is variously known. Some of her names and iconographic features are described in the Śrītattvanidhi. All of them are related to knowledge. Śakti is both māyā or avidyā as well as Vidyā. Vidyā appears as the mūlaprakṛti or as the material cause of the universe of name and form. She takes different names and forms such as Sarasvati, Gāyatrī, Vidyā Vāgcśvarī, Varṇeśvarī etc.

The Śrītattvanidhi, in its description of Sarasvatī, follows the Mārkaṇḍeya Purāṇa and describes her as Viṣṇurūpiṇī. Therefore she is said to have her mount the Garuda, the vāhana of Viṣṇu and holds in her hands the emblems of Viṣṇu, such as a conch (śaṅkha), a discus (chakra), a mace (gadā). According to this description of the Śrītattvanidhi her one hand, instead holding a lotus, shows the abhaya posture (S. T. 101).

This is no wonder that the Śrītattvanidhi describes Sarasvatī with the features and emblem of Viṣṇu. Mythologically, she is also known as the spouse of Viṣṇu, as well as of Śiva.

Thus, it is said that she was originally the wife of Viṣṇu along with Lakṣmī and Gaṅgā. But Viṣṇu could not endure their quarrellings so he gave Sarasvatī to Brahmā and Gaṅgā to Śiva.[1]

The Skanda Purāṇa associates the goddess with Śiva. Therefore her features are described with the Śavite traits. According to this text, she has jaṭāmukuṭa on her head, in which there is a crescent moon inserted. Her neck, like Śiva, is of blue colour and has three eyes.

But normally she is known as the female half of Prajāpati and helps creation. As Brahmā's wife she executes what Brahmā has conceived with his creative intelligence. She is the goddess of all the creative arts, poetry, music and also science.

Her normal features according to the Aṁśumadbhedāgama is as follows :[2]

She, the goddess of white complexion (śuklavarṇā), wears white garments and sits on white lotus. She wears yajnopavīta, ratna kuṇḍala and a jaṭā mukuṭa. She has four hands showing the vyākhyāna pose and holds a rosary (akṣasūtra), a book (pustaka), and a lotus (puṇḍarīka). She has three eyes.

According to the Viṣṇudharmottara Purāṇa and the Hemādri the goddess Sarasvatī is decked with all ornaments (sarvābharaṇabhusitā) and stand in the samapada pose on a lotus. She shows in her four hands a book (pustaka), a rosary (akṣamālā), a viṇā (vaiṇavī) and a waterpot (kamaṇḍalu).[3]

The Devī Māhātmya describes the goddess similary but instead the Kamaṇḍalu it reccomends an elephant goad (aṅkuśa) in one of her hands.

The Rūpamaṇḍana describes her as having one face and three hands. She wears a mukuṭa and Kuṇḍalas as well as a crescent on her head. She has a prabhāmaṇḍala also.[4]

This text making distinction between Mahāvidyā and Sarasvatī describes differently the two goddesses. Thus, while Mahāvidyā holds in her four hands a rosary (akṣa), a lotus (abja), a vīṇā and a book (pustaka), the goddess Sarasvatī shows the vara pose in one of her hands instead holding the vīṇā. In rest of her hands she holds a rosary (akṣa), a lotus (abja) and a book (pustaka).[5]

Sarasvatī, according to the Śrītattvanidhi is also identified with the Sāmaveda (S. T. 102).

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

This text describes Sarasvatī, the consort of Brahmā as Vāgīśvarī also. But the iconographic features of Sarasvatī is quite distinctive. Contrary to Sarasvatī, the features of Vāgīśvarī is common to Brahmā. Thus, it is said that Vāgēśvarī is of white complexion. She adorns herself with jaṭāmukuṭa and ratnakuṇḍala. Besides wearing the muktāhāra, she also wears a yajñopavita. She has three eyes. In her two right hands she holds a staff (sudaṇḍa) and a rosary (akṣamālā) and in her left hands she shows book (pustaka) and and a kuṇḍikā. (S. T. 131).

Fig. 31
Sarasvatī, 12th Cent. A. D.
Pala, Asutosh Museum,
Calcutta.

The Śritattvanidhi presents two other forms of Vāgīśvarī also. They are Dhenuvāgīśvarī and Saubhāgya Vāgīśvarī.

Dhenu Vāgīśvarī, the deity of Sabda Brahma (Sabda Brahmamayīm) is of white complexion like a marble and wears white garments (śuklāmbarām). She has three eyes and wears a crescent over her head. Decked with various ornaments she holds in her four hands a goad (aṅkuśa), a rosary (akṣasūtra), a noose (pāśa) and a book (pustaka) (S. T. 132).

Saubhāgya Vāgīśvarī is also of white complexion. Having beautiful features of a youthful women she has in her hands a pen (lekhanī) and a book (pustaka), (S. T. 133).

There is an interesting mythology related with the goddess Gāyatrī, the other spouse of Brahmā According to this story Brahmā had great inconvenience in performing the sacrifical rites due to the idle nature of Sarasvatī. She was always late in accompanying Brahmā on the occassions of sacrifical performances. On one of the similar occasions, getting annoyed with Sarasvatī, who could not come to the sacrifical place to join Brahmā, performing a yajna, he with the permission of gods married Gāyatrī, the daughter of a sage, as a second wife and completed the ritual.[6]

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

In the Śrītattvanidhi, however, the goddess Gāyatrī is conceived as a kumarī, the unmarried and similar in features to Agni (vahnirūpiṇīm). Her complexion is described as red and similar is the colour of her garments. Though she has only four hands, she is the goddess having four faces and eight eyes In her right two hands she holds a lotus (padma) and a rosary (akṣamālā) and in the left hands she has a kamaṇḍalu and a 'sruvā'. She as the personification of Rigveda (Rigvedarūpinī) sits on a lotus throne (padmapītha) and rides on a swan (haṁsa). (S. T. 100).

The goddess Sāvitrī, another wife of Brahmā is the personification of Yajurveda (Yajurvedarūpiṇī). Her mount is a bull (govṛṣa). Her features are analogous to that of Rudra, (Rudrarūpiṇīm). She is an young woman and wears white garments. She has four hands, four faces and twelve eyes. She also wears a crescent over her head. In her hands she shows a rudrākṣa, a khatvāṅga, and a triśūla. One of the four of her hands is in the abhaya pose (S. T. 101).

In another dhyāna of Sāvitrī, she is described as the Universal Mother (Lokamātaram) (S. T. 376).

Sarasvatī is honoured by the Jainas as 'Vidyādevī. In the Buddhist pantheon the goddess is regarded as the consort of Mañjuśrī. She is described in different Sādhanamālās in five different forms. As Mahāsarasvatī she has two hands holding a lotus in the left hand and showing the abhaya pose in the right hand. As Vajravīṇā Sarasvatī she, plays Vīṇā with two hands. As Vajra-Śāradā she takes her seat on a lotus and has a crescent on head. She in her two hands holds a lotus and a book. She has three eyes. As Āryasarasvatī (or Vajrasarasvatī) she holds a lotus stem in the left-hand with the Prajñāpāramitā placed on the lotus. As Vajrasarasvatī she has three faces and six hands. In her right hands she holds a lotus with the Prajñāpāramitā book, a sword, and a kartṛ. In the left hand she shows a kapāla, a jewel and a disc.[7]

The mount of Sarasvatī is more commonly a swan. But in the Deccan style she is also shown on a peacock. On same occasions her mount is also shown as lamb or a lion.[8]

In the tradition of Indian sculpture the goddess is generally shown with two hands holding a vīṇā. The earliest image of Sarasvatī is formed on a Bharhut railing. Here, the goddess standing on a lotus plays a vīṇā of seven strings.[9] From Kaṅkālī Tilā (Mathura) a Jaina Sarasvatī is known which shows in one hand a pustaka. The emblem of the other hand is not clear, but probably she was holding a pen or was in the vyākhyāna pose.[10]

On Gupta coins also there is a number of representations of Sarasvatī. Thus, on the reverse of the Lyrist Type of Samudragupta's gold coin the goddess is shown sitting on a wicker stool. She does not show any known attributes of Sarasvatī in her hands.

Two other goddesses Śrīvidyā and Śuddhavidyā are also described in the Śrītattvanidhi as the consorts of Brahmā. Śrīvidyā seems to be the presiding deity of music. It is stated in the text that she admires vinā and music (vīṇā-digānapriyā). Her special attributes of the hands are not indicated in the text (S. T. 86).

But so far the goddess Śuddhavidyā is concerned it is mentioned that she in her two hands holds a rosary (akṣamālā), a book (pustaka) and in rest of the two she shows the poses of the chinamudrā and the abhaya. (S. T. 85).

The images of Sarasvatī belonging to the early mediaeval period are very commonly found with two arms playing vīṇā. One such image of Sarasvatī is found from Khiching Orissa in which the goddess is depicted like a Nāginī with seven hood playing on a vīṇā.[11] A beautiful figure of this goddess but without hood, is in the Asutosh Museum, Calcutta. Decked with jewelleries and well arranged coiffeur the goddess here is shown with two hands playing on a vīṇā.[12] Similar images of the goddess Sarasvatī are found in the Patna and Sarnath Museums.

When the goddess Sarasvatī is represented in the early mediaeval art with four hands, she generally holds a vīṇā in two front hands, and a rosary and a book in her back hands. With these features we find a number of examples from Bihar and Bengal. With the same traits we find some examples of Sarasvatī images from Mathura and Allahabad. Some four armed figures of Sarasvati from Khajuraho show the vīṇā in two front hands while the back hands show a book and a lotus, instead a rosary. Some four handed goddess represent the lotus in two hands and the varada pose and a book in the next two hands. In one example from Vāmana temple (Khajuraho) the goddesss how ghaṇṭā in one of the hands along with the varada pose, lotus and vīṇā in other three hands.[13]

Rajasthani sculptors have delineated the goddess Sarasvatī a bit differently. Such four armed Sarasvatī figures do not show Vīṇā, which is the ancient most emblem of Sarasvatī. Instead, the goddess show the Vyākhyāna pose with a rosary on the palm in one hand and the rest three hands show kamaṇḍalu, a book and a lotus. Her mount, either swan or a ram or a lion is also shown on the pedestal. Such examples are noted from Pallu (Bikaner), and Vimala Vasahi (Dilwara).[14]

A Parmāra image of Vāgdevī, probably of the time of Bhoja, belonging to the Jain cult is one of the best examples of the images representing the goddess Sarasvatī. This goddess is represented in this figure in the tribhaṅga pose. The upper hands of the goddess show a śūla and a deer, the lower ones are broken. Thus, iconographically this figure is different in tradition than that of Hindu figures found in the other parts of India.[15]

The South Indian examples of the images representing the goddess Sarasvatī, generally follow the iconographic traits of North Indian images, with the distinction that occasionally, the goddess is shown with more than four arms and with a breast band (kuchabandha). The other notable feature of Southern Indian images of Sarasvatī is that her iconographic features, particularly the emblems in the hands represent the goddess as the consort of Śiva rather than of Brahmā, contrary to the tradition with the North Indian images.[16]

Most of the Chālukyan images of Sarasvatī as known from Gadag, Bagalī, Kattesvara (Hirhadgalli) etc. are shown as sitting in a Vīrāsana pose. The four hands of the goddess normally show Vyākhyāna pose with an akṣamālā in one hand on the rest of the three hands hold a book, a goad (aṅkuśa) a noose (pāśa) or a Vīṇā. One example of Sarasvatī from the Haihaya school of art represents the goddess with club in one of the hands.

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

The swan is invariably shown as the mount of goddess in South Indian images of Sarasvatī.[17]

In the Chola art, thoughs the goddess is normally shown in the vīrāsana pose, she is represented with two hands only. Such, an example from Bṛhadīśvara temple show the goddess holding a book, in one hand and has placed the other on her thigh.[18]

Some images from Central India and South India represent the goddess with more than four hands. Examples representing the goddess with six or eight hands are known from Khajuraho.[19] A tenth century A. D. image of the goddess Sarasvatī depicting her with six hands carrying a battle axe (paraśu), a branch of Kalpavṛkṣa, a vīṇā etc. (other hands are broken) in dancing pose is very remarkable example of the goddess from the Chalukyan art of Kalyāṇī. A figure of Sarasvatī as the consort of Śiva is known for Brahmeśevasa tample, Śrīsailam. This image depicts the goddess with six hands holding a noose, a battle axe, a goad and showing the varada pose. The emblem of the remaining one hand is not distinct.[20]

In the Hoysala art there are several examples of Sarasvatī with four and six hands but invariably shown as the Śakti of Śiva. While representing the goddess with six hands she is shown holding a lotus, a rosary, a goad, a noose, of a vīṇā and a book.[21]

The Śrītattvanidhi describes nearly a dozen of forms of Lakṣmī, the consort Viṣṇu, besides Annapūrṇā and Tulasī.

We have already described the iconographic features of Mahālakṣmī (Supra pp. 18-21). With reference to Kollapur Mahālakṣmī, further it is recommended that the goddess Mahālakṣmī should be portrayed similar to Lakṣmī. Decked with various ornaments she in her four hands shows a pot (pātra), the club (Kaumodakī) a shield (kheṭaka) and the fruit śrīphals. She holds the liṅga over her head (vībhratimastakelingam). (S. T. 110).

According to the Śrītattvanidhi the goddess Lakṣmī when represented along with Viṣṇu (Hare-samīpake) she should be shown only with two hands holding the lotus flowers in both the hands. In such form she has her complexion like gold (hemavarnaḥ). (S. T. 108).

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

But when the goddess is represented independently, as indicated in the Hemādri (vratakhaṇḍa) and in the Viṣṇudharmottara Purāṇa[22], she should be represented with four hands, holding a lotus with a long stalk, the pot full of ambrosia (amṛtaghaṭa), the vilva fruit and a conch (śaṅkha). (S. T. 109).

With these features when the goddess is being bathed by two elephants, standing a little behind, she is known as Gajalakṣmī or Abhiṣekalakṣmī. In this form as the Śrītattvanidhi points out, the goddess should show over her head a lotus also. Her complexion is described as of gold. (S. T. 109)

Elsewhere, in the Viṣṇunidhi of the Śrītattvanidhi (4) the features of four armed Lakṣmī having her seat on the red lotus is described. Like other forms of Lakṣmī she is of gold complexion. Described as the Universal Mother (bhuvanamātā) she is decked with curious ornaments and a mukuṭa. She holds in two upper hands the lotus flowers and with two normal hands she shows the boon-confering (yeṣṭa) and abhaya poses. (S. T. II. 4).

Among the Pañcharātra worshippers, Vīralakṣmī has special significance. According to the Śrītattvanidhi Vīralakṣmī sits on a lotus throne and her colour is golden (svarṇavarṇaḥ). Out of four hands she shows the varada and the abhaya poses in two of her normal hands and the upper two hands she holds two lotuses (S. T. 112).

Besides, this form of Vīralakṣmī having four hands, this text also describes the goddess with two and eight hands. Two handed Vīralakṣmī does not show any special attribute. With right hand she shows the abhaya pose and with the left the varada pose. (S. T. 113).

The eight handed Vīralakṣmī shows a noose (pāśa), a goad (aṅkuśa), a rosary (akṣasūtra), the vara and the abhaya poses, a mace (gadā), a lotus (padma) and a pot (pātra). (S. T. 114).

Another form of Lakṣmī, described in the Śrītattvanidhi as Prasannalakṣmī. Like other form of Lakṣmī, her complexion is also described in the Śrītattvanidhi as primodial energy (ādyaśakti), the mother of all (sakalajananīm) and one occuping her place as wife at the left of Viṣṇu (Viṣṇuvāmāṅkasansthām). These special form of Lakṣmī are rarely seen represehted in the images.

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

So far her attributes in the hands are concerned, the emblems of only three hands are described. The fourth hand probably should be in the Varada pose–a pose quite befitting for Lakṣmī. According to the Śrītattvanidhi the three hands of the Goddess should hold a cirtrus (vījapūraka), a golden pitcher (kanakakalaśa), the golden lotus (hemapadma). (S. T. 115).

On the basis of Krīyāpada of Pañcharātra Śritattvanidhi describes Padmalakṣmī as sitting on the lotus. So far her attributes are conceived it is said that she holds on the right hand a lotus (paṅkaja) and in the left śrīphala. Her colour is like a lotus (padma varnah). (S. T. 134).

Śrī and Bhūmi as the consorts of Viṣṇu are separately described in the Śrītattvanidhi. Śrī the, Mother of three worlds (trailokyamātāram) is of gold complexion (hemavarṇaḥ) and of very pacific nature (saumya). In her four hands she holds a noose (pāśa), a rosary (akṣamalikā), a lotus (ambhoja) and a sickle (śreṇi). (S. T. 111)

The goddess Bhūmi is described in the Viṣṇunidhi[24] (5) as of gold-colour (svarṇavarṇaḥ). In the right hand she shows the abhaya pose and in her left hand she holds a pomegranate (dāḍima). Decked with all kinds of ornaments she sits under the Kalpataru and thus full-fills the desires of the devotees. Below her left feet is placed the pitchers full of riches (nidhikumbha).

The Viṣṇudharmottara Purāṇa describes the goddess as of white complexion (śuklavarṇaḥ) and decked with ornaments. She is four armed; in them she holds three pots-one full of jewel (ratnapātra), other containing vegitables (sasyapātra), and the third containing medicinal herbs (oṣadhi). The fourth hand has a lotus. She is seated upon the back of four diggajas or elephants of the quarters.[24]

Tulasī devī, another spouse of Viṣṇu, is of dark complexion, with eyes resembling the petals of the lotus (kamalalochanā). Her two hands are in the vara and the abhaya poses and the rest two hold the flowers of lotus. She adorns herself with the kirīṭa, hāra, keyūra and kuṇḍala. She sits on the lotus flower. (S. T. 99).

In the Śrītattvanidhi two forms of Annapūrṇā are also described. According to one form, she is a two handed goddess with red complexion and three eyes. Her breasts are high and the face is round like the full moon (pūrṇedu-bimba),

In her left hand she carries a vessel set with rubies and containing in it honey. In the right hand she has a spoon set with rubies (ratnadarvī), containing delicious rice.

When the goddess is represented with four hands her colour is described as that of mercury (sindūravarṇaḥ), but in other bodily features she is similar to dvibhuja Annapurṇā. In her four hands, she shows the abhaya and vara poses and holds a noose (pāśa) and a goad. She should also be shown with three eyes. In addition to this feature a crescent moon should also be shown over her head. (S. T. 104).

The images of Śrīdevi are found represented in Indian art since 2nd century B.C. The figures associated with the lotus flower and represented on the rail pillars of Bharhut, Sanchi and Bodhgaya are generally identified with the goddess Śrīdevī. We have seen earlier, how the figures of Gajalakṣmī are variously represented in the early and the early mediaeval art. (Supra p. 41) T. A. G. Rao has illustrated a beautiful ivory figure of dvibhuja Annapūrṇā holding a spoon and the pot full of anna. This figure is from Trivendrum.[25]

The Pañcharātra texts associate the goddess Nīladevī with Viṣṇu. The Śrītattvanidhi in the Chapter Viṣṇunidhi (6), describes the goddess as of the colour of nīlotpaladala wearing the garments of blue colour is decked with all kinds of ornaments. Her two hands are in the vara and the abhaya poses and the rest two hold the flowers of kumuda.

Gaurī, the consort of Śiva, is variously named such as Pārvatī, Umā, Kālī, Durgā, Ambikā etc. Kālī or Durgā or Ambikā is most commonly the names given to the fierce form of Gaurī. Umā and Pārvatī are the names of the goddess representing her beautiful and auspicious form. Gaurī represents the fertility aspect of 'Śiva's śakti.'

The Śrītattvanidhi does not contain any reference to Gaurī in the Śaktinidhi' Chapter. But elsewhere, in the Śivanidhi and the Grahanidhi there are several references to Gaurī. In the Śivanidhi (2) she has been described us the goddess having white garments on her person (śuklāmbarā). She sits on the lotus throne made of eight petals of the flower. Her sitting posture is described as vināyakavat. In the first right hand of the goddess which is adorned with the keyūra

there is a lotus with a big stalk. The left normal hand holds the pot of ambrosia (amṛtaghaṭa). In rest of the two hands there is the vilva fruit and the śaṅkha. Her colour is white like the marble (markata).

When shown along with Śiva at his left it is recommended that the goddess Gaurī shou'd be shown in the black colour (syāmavarṇaḥ) with three eyes and two arms; holding the flowers of lotus. (Śivanidhi, 37).

In the Grahanidhi of the Śrītattvanidhi (100) Gauri is described as the daughter of Girīndra, having the crescent on her head and riding a buli (vṛṣavarasansthām).

As Girijā, described in the Śivanidhi, she possesses the beautiful bodily features and occupies her place at the left of the god Śiva. She in this form has only two hands and two eyes. The attributes of the hands are not described in the text. (Śivanidhi 42).

The Viṣṇudharmottara Purāṇa describes Gaurī as an unmarried girl. According to this text Gaurī may be represented with two hands or four hands. As two handed Gaurī, she should show in her hands the varada and the abhaya poses. And as Gaurī of four hands she should hold akṣamālā, padma and kamaṇḍalu and the fourth one shows the abhaya pose. She sits on the lotus throne.[26]

But as the consort of Śiva, i.e., the married Gaurī, she is more preferably known as Umā or Pārvatī. In this form the Rūpamaṇḍana describes, the features of Umā as having four hands holding in them a rosary (akṣasūtra), a lotus (ambuja), a mirror (darpaṇa) and a waterpot (kamaṇḍalu).[27]

Fig. 33 Gaṅgā

The Śrītattvanidhi gives the description of Gaṅgā also, another wife of Śiva. According to this account the goddess is of white complexion and has three eyes. In her four hands she has a full pot (pūrṇakumbha), a lotus of white colour (sitāmbhoja) and shows the vara and the abhaya poses. (S.T. Bramhanidhi, 130).

SHE IN HER MINOR FORMS

She out of Her creates several minor forms such as of Yoginis. Yoginis are the attendants of the goddess Durgā[1] or Kālī and assists her in the act of destruction. Therefore they are fearful in look. Rājataraṅgiṇī[2] calls them as madyapadevatā, who were both lustful and blood chirsty. They could reanimate the dead to satisfy their desires, or tear them to pieces to appease their hunger.[3] Thay dance in the battle-field making use of the skulls of the slain as their symbols.[4] Śiva employed them to drink up the blood and devour the flesh of the demon Jālandhara.[5]

But this is one aspect of the Yoginis. They in their fearful form and behaviour represent the human evils and weaknesses. Otherwise they are kind also to their devotees i.e., to those who are good. How they represent the human passions and other primitive propensities is clear from the study of the names of the Yoginis in the 'Śrītattvanidhi'. The names of these yoginis suggest that they represent human passions, feelings and other mental capacities such as kāma, buddhi, ahaṅkāra, feelings of sparśa, rūpa, gaṅdha, nāma, dhaīrya, smṛti, chetanā, sanchobha, ahldāa, saṁohana, stambhana, jibhrā, raṅjanā, unmāda, jñāna, vyādhi, ānanda, moda etc. Their names suggest how due to their power of attraction they free the mind and heart of the devotee from these ills or week-feelings and emotions and make him pose and fit for devotions to the Ādiśakti, the Great Mother.

Similary, the names of same Yogins of Kulotīrṇā, Nigarbha and Rahasya categories are suggestive of their kindness and boon-confering nature. They are the bestower of energy (śakti), acomplishment (siddhi), wealth (sampatti), appreciation and favour (priyatā), auspiciousness (maṅgala), fullfiller of desire

(kāma), remover of distress (dukkha), death (mṛtyu) obstacles (vighna), giver of beauty (śaundarya), good fortune (saubhāgya), knowledge (Jñāna) etc.

Same is the conclusion of the study of other lists of names of Yoginis in the Purāṇas, such as Matsya and Bhaviṣya. Such names as Raktākṣī, Bhayaṅkarī, Yamadūtī, though suggest their fearful form and nature (ugra or krūra), the names such as Rūpanī etc. indicate their pasfic or placid (saumya) nature.[6]

It is very difficult to determine the cult association of the Yoginis. Various suggestions have been made in this connection and scholars some time associate them either with the Sahaja cult, or with the cult of Kaula-Kāpālikas[7] or even with the Natha Sampradāya.[8] It is also assumed that originally it belonged to Saivism and through a transition transformed into Śaktism[9]. It is also believed that Yoginis are different forms of Durgā, which she had assumed while killing the great demons–Śumbha and Niśumbha.[10]. They are also associated with the story of Raktavīja in which their function was to suck the blood of the demon.[11] They are also associated with the seven or eight Mothers. It is suggested that the principal Yoginīs are seven or eight (the Mothers)[12] but their number at times raised to sixty four.[13] As a matter of fact there is great variations in the names of the Mātrikās. Utpala, commenting on Bṛhatsaṁhitā has given two lists of the Mātrikās. The first list includes the names of Brāhmī, Vaiṣṇavī, Raudrī (Māheśvari), Kaumāri, Aindri, Yamī, Vāruṇī and Kauberi. In the second list he includes some more names such as, Nāraśiṁhī, Vārāhī and Vaināyikī.[14] In later concept the number of the Mātrikās increased up to sixteen (gramryādi soḍaṣa Mātrikā)[15]. Charls Fabri Comments on these lists as follows :—

'Whatever some people may think the connexion with the five, seven, eight or nine Mothers is only a vague probability. One may ask, how did the five seven. eight or nine Mothers turn it into 64 ?. One suggestion, ...was that there were the eight Mātrikās, each with eight attendants and that this developed into 64 goddesses. There is a distinct probability here, but it involves some arithmetic problem. For, if the eight mothers, each had eight attendant Yoginis, the attendents alone would make $8 \times 8 = 64$, and where are the additional eight Mothers left ? Further he remarks 'It is also important to observe that the connexion of the Yogini's with the Mother Goddesses is most tenuous. Not only do they not all occur in either of these lists, but the few that occur in one are absent from the other. This line of research does not seem to lead any where. Any connection with the Mothers must have been past history and there has been, as I venture to conjecture, wholesale identification with and elevation to divine rank, of small local godlings, perhaps, in the some way as popular belief in the local Yakṣis entered rapidily into Buddhism.'[16]

Certainly there are various factors in the increase of the list of the Yogini's. The various lists are not identical due to the reasons, perhaps, in the difference of local beliefs in the concept about Yoginis. The galaxy of the Mother Goddess all over the country are so numerous, that no list can exhaust the names of the Mothers. Even in the Matsya Purāṇa there are two hundred names of the Mothers as enumerated by V. S. Agrawala.[17] Most of the names of the list of the Matsya Purāṇa are included in the Yogini list. Therefore neither the list of Mātrikās are confined to the traditional number of seven nor the list of the Yoginis to the traditional number sixtyfour. When Fabri commented, as quoted above, he was probably not aware of the lists of the Yoginis other than Bheraghata inscription and of the Skanda Purāṇa. But if one looks into the lists published by V.S. Agrawala, he will find all the names of seven or eight or even sixteen Mātrikās included in these lists. This makes it clear that the basis of the evolution of the list of Yoginis are the seven or eight Mothers. It is also to be pointed out that functionally there is not much difference between the acts of the Yoginis and the Mātrikās. Both assist and attend Durgā in her fight against the demons. The seven Mothers also perform their duties as war-goddess like the Yoginis. Both possess the power of destruction (saṁhāra) and both are benevolent to the devotees when they are made pacified. As they represent evil spirits, they have to be kept under the control. The Kūrma Purāṇa[18] refers to this aspect. After the war with the demons was over these Mātrikas created havoc and began to destroy everything in the universe for the porpose of feeding themselves. Then on the command of Śiva, Vīrabhadra

took them to Pātālaloka to save the universe. These evil spirits are constantly controlled through the vigilence of Vīrabhadra and Gaṇeśa. This is how in the Mātrikāpaṭṭas the Mothers are made flanked by Vīrabhadra and Gaṇeśa

Thus, there is logic behind the process of inclusion of the Mātrikas in the lists of Yoginis.

According to the Varāha Purāṇa the Mātrikas are eight in number and represent eight mental qualities which are morally bad. Accordingly, Yogeśvarī represents kāma or desire; Māheśvarī krodha or anger; Vaiṣṇavī lobha or covetousness; Brāhmaṇī mada or pride; Kaumārī moha or illusion; Indrāṇī, mātsarya or fault finding; Yamī or Chāmuṇḍā paiśunya or talebearing; and Vārāhī. asūyā or envy.[19]

If we study the list of the Yoginis in the Śrītattvanidhi we will find that actually there are only eight forms described, and all the names of sixty-nine Yoginis are grouped into eight categories representing only in eight prescribed forms. The names of the Yoginis in the list of the Śrītattvanidhi also suggest, as we shall see, more or less represent the mental and emotional qualities of man, good or bad.

We present five list of the Yoginis other than the list of the Śrītattva nidhi. The first list is prepared by Cunnigham, R. D. Banerji, W. Karmbelkar on the basis of their decipherment of Bheraghat inscriptions of the Chauṣṭha Yoginī Temple. The Yoginis are shown here surrounded by the pretas. Some of the niches orignially having the images, are vacant and in some case the label inscriptions are mutilated. As the hands of most of the Yoginis are broken, the emblems in them are not distinct. Some Yoginis are shown with attendants, who hold in their hands the weapons of their goddesses. The Yoginis also show their individual symbols and their mounts. The list of the Yoginis are tabulated here mentioning their symbols or mount and special features.[20]

The paurāṇika accounts of the Yoginis are in the Matsya, Bhaviṣya, Skanda, Agni and Kālikā-Purāṇas. The names according to the Skanda Purāṇa are as folows.[21] Gajānanā, Siṁhamukhī, Gṛdhrasyā, Kākatuṇḍikā, uṣtragrīvā, Hayagrīvā, Vārāhī, Śarabhānanā, Ulūkikā, Śivāravā, Mayūrī, Vikaṭānanā, Aṣtavaktrā, Kotarākṣī, Kubjā, Vikaṭa-lochanā, Śuṣkodarī, Lolajihvā, Śvadanṣtrā, Vānarānanā, Rikṣākṣī, Kekarākṣī, Bṛahattuṇḍā, Surāpriyā, Kapālahastā, Raktākāi, Śuki, Śyeni Kapotikā, Pāśahastā, Daṇḍahastā, Prachaṇḍā, Chaṇḍavikramā, Śiśughni, Pāpahantrī, Kālī, Rudhirapāyinī, Vasāḍhyā, Garbhabhakṣā, Śavāhastā, Āntramālinī, Sthūlakeśī, Bṛhatkukṣi, Sarpāsyā, Pretavāhanā, Daṇḍaśūkakarā, Krauñchī Mṛgaśirṣā, Vṛṣānanā, Vyāttāsyā, Dhūmanihśvāsā, Vyomaikā, Charanordhvaḍḍaka, Tāpanī, Soṣaṇīdṛṣti, Koṭarī, Sthūlanāsikā, Vidyutprabhā, Balakāsyā, Mārjārī, Kaṭapūtanā, Aṭṭahasā, Kāmākṣī, Mṛgalochanā.

If one looks into the list he will find that the names instead being the personal ones, are descriptive and indicate mostly the bodily features derived from the animal word. Out of this whole list only Tāpinī, Simhamukhī as Simhananā and Vārāhī find the mention in the inscriptional list of Yoginis of Bheraghata.

V. S. Agrawala has given three lists of Yoginis, probably on the basis of ancient texts in his 'Ancient Indian Folk Cults[22]. All the lists include names of sixty four Yoginis. The first list is as below :

(1) Brahmāṇī, (2) Kumārī (3) Śaṅkārī, (4) Rudrāṇī, (5) Kiṅkālī, (6) Karālī, (7) Kālī, (8) Mahākāli, (9) Chāmuṇḍā, (10) Jvālāmukhī, (11) Kāmākṣī, (12) Vārāhī, (13) Bhadrakālī, (14) Durgā, (15) Aṁbikā, (16) Lalitā, (17) Goravī, (18) Sumaṅgalā, (19) Rohiṇī, (20) Kapilā, (21) Śūlakarā, (22) Knḍalanī, (23) Tripurā, (24) Kurukullyā, (25) Bhairavī, (26) Champāvatī, (27) Nārasiṁhī, (28) Nirañjanā, (29) Hemāvatī, (30) Pretāsanā, (31) Īśvarī, (32) Vasaṅkarī, (33) Vināyakī, (34) Yamaghaṇṭā, (35) Sarasvatī, (36) Totilā, (37) Veṁsaṇavī (Vaiṣṇavī), (38) Vaindī, (39) Saṁsthānī, (40) Padminī, (41) Chittraṇī, (42) Vāruṇī, (43) Yambhaganī, (44) Sūryaputrī, (45) Suśitalā, (46) Kṛṣṇavārāhī, (47) Raktākṣī, (48) Kālarātrī, (49) Ākāśi, (50) Śreṣṭhanī, (51) Jayā, (52) Vijayā, (53) Imavatī, (54) Vāgeśvarī, (55) Kātyāyinī, (56) Agnihotrī, (57) Chakreśvarī, (58) Mahāvidyā, (59) Īśānī, (60) Bhavānī, (61) Bhuvaneśvarī, (62) Chakreśvarī, (63) Moharātrī (Mahārātrī and (64) Dhidevī.

His second list includes the names of (1) Kālī, (2) Karālī, (3) Īśvarī, (4) Susāmālā, (5) Divyāyogī, (6) Mahayogī, (7) Vāruṇī, (8) Brahmāṇī, (9) Aṁbikā, (10) Durgā, (11) Jayā, (12) Vijayā, (13) Dhumāvatī, (14) Kāmeśvarī, (15) Chāmuṇḍā, (16) Mahākālī, (17) Chitrāṇī, (18) Vāruṇī, (19) Kurukullā, (20) Kapilā, (21) Rohinī, (22) Sumaṅgalā, (23) Vārāhī, (24) Raktākṣī, (25) Vaināyiki, (26) Yamaghaṇṭā, (27) Vaiṣvānarī, (28) Pretāsanā, (29) Hemakaṇṭhā, (30) Nirañjanī, (31) Śaṅkhavī, (32) Padmanī, (33) Chandrāvatī, (34) Nārasimhī, (35) Chaṇḍī, (36) Śautilā, (37) Sarasvatī, (38) Harasiddhi, (39) Vaiṣṇavī, (40) Īśvarī, (41) Lalitā, (42) Gaurī, (43) Sūryaputrī, (44) Pemabhaganī, (45) Vanadevī, (46) Nārāyaṇī, (47) Bhairavī, (48) Bhadrāvatī, (49) Agnihotrī, (50) Katyāyinī, (51) Jvālāmukhī, (52) Kāmākṣī, (53) Kapālinī, (54) Bhadrakālī, (55) Sreṣṭhinī, (56) Kālarātrī, (57) Yugeśvarī, (58) Siddhī. (59) Kaumārī, (60) Saṅkarī, (61) Indrāṇī, (62) Hṛiṅkālī, (63) Mahavidyā and (64) Chakreśvarī.

While the two above lists include most of the common names, the third list provides most of the new names of the Yoginis. Their number is only sixty three (one name is missing). This list gives following names :

(1) Divyāyoginī, (2) Mahāyoginī, (3) Siddhayoginī, (4) Yugeśvarī, (5) Pretākṣī, (6) Dākinī, (7) Kālī, (3) Kālarātrī, (9) Niśācharī, (10) Kliṅkārī. (11) Siddhavaitālī, (12) Hṛṅkārī, (13) Bhūtadāma, (14) Urdhvakeşi (15) Virūpākṣī, (16) Raktākṣī, (17) Narabhojanī (The name of the eighteenth yogini is not listed by V. S. Agrawala), (19) Virabhadrākṣī, (20) Dhūmrākṣī, (21) Kalahapriyā, (22) Rākṣasī, (23) Ghoraraktākṣi, (24) Viraktākṣi, (25) Bhayaṅkari, (26) Virā, (27) Kumārī, (28) Chaṇḍikā, (29) Vārāhī, (30) Muṇḍadhāriṇī, (31) Bhairavī, (32) Vajraṇī, (33) Krodhāyī, (34) Durmukhī, (35) Pretavāhinī, (36) Kaṇṭakī, (37) Lamboṣṭhī, (38) Mālinī, (39) Mantrayoginī, (40) Kālākṣi, (41) Mohinī, (42) Chakrī, (43) Kaṅkālī, (44) Bhuvaneśvarī, (45) Kuṇḍalī, (46) Mālinī, (47) Lakṣmī, (48) Dhenaduri, (49) Karālī, (50) Kauśikī, (51) Bhadrāṇī, (52) Vyāghraṇī, (53) Yakṣayai, (54) Yakṣīṇī, (55) Kumārī, (56) Yantravāhinī, (57) Viśālī, (58) Kāmākṣi, (59) Viṣahariṇī, (60) Dvijaṭi, (61) Vikaṭi, (62) Dhorāyai, (63) Kapālī and (64) Viśalaṅguli.

The list of Yoginis in the Śrītattvanidhi does not fully tally[23] with either the Purāṇic lists of the Yognis or with the names of the Yoginis as labelled in the Chausatha Yogini Temple at Bheraghat. The several features of the list of the Śrītattvanidhi are noteworthy. The list is not confined to sixty-four only and enumerates as many as sixty-nine names to be grouped into eight categories. The first group includes the names of the sixteen Yoginis. They are Kāmākarṣaṇikā, Budhyākarṣanitā, Ahaṁkāra-karṣaṇikā, Sarvakarṣanikā, Sparśakarṣaṇikā, Nityarūpakarṣanikā, Rasakarṣaṇikā, Gandhakarṣaṇikā, Chittakarṣṇikā, Nityadhariyakarṣaṇikā, Smṛtyākarṣaṇikā, Nityānamākarṣaṇikā, Vijākarṣanikā, Nityāchatmākarṣaṇikā, Amṛta karṣanī and Nityaśarirakarṣiṇī. All these Gupta—Yoginis are of placid nature and remain always with smiling face (prahasitānanā). They are all of four hands and three eyes and show the crescent-moon over their diadem. With a divine glamour (divyakānti) their complexion is red (rakta-varṇaḥ). In their four hands they all hold a bow (chāpa), the arrows (bāṇa), the shield (charma) and the sword (khaṅga). (S. T. 9).

The next category of Guptatara—Yoginis includes the names of eight Yoginīs and all of them show their red complexion. The name of Yoginis are given as Anaṅga Sumanā, Anaṅga Mekhalā, Anaṅga Madnā, Anaṅga Madanāturā, Anaṅga Rekhā, Anaṅga Vegā, Anaṅga aṅkuśā, and Anaṅga, Mālinī. All these yoginis have in their four hands, a bow of sugar-cane (Ikṣuchāpa), the arrows of flower (puṣpaśāra), puṣpakaṅtuka and the lotus–flower (utpala). (S. T. 10).

The third category of Yoginis are known as Sampradāya Yoginis. This list includes the names of fourteen Yoginis among them Sarvasaṅchobhiṇī is the supreme most (sampradayāmukhya). She is born out of the ashes of Kāma (after he was brunt by enraged Śiva) and is of very short tempered (atitīvra-svabhāvā). She holds in her four hands a fire-bow (vahnichāpa), a fire arrow (vahnibāṇa), a fire–sword (vahnirūpamasi), and a fire-disc (vahnichakra). She is always angry with the demon, the foe of the gods (a surasa). Her colour is red.

Under her leadership there are other thirteen more Yoginis who in complexion, nature and emblems follow their leader Sarva-sanichobhiṇī. Their names are enumerated as Sarvavidrāvaṇī, Sarvā-karṣaṇikā, Sarvasamohinī, Sarvastambhanikā, Sarvajibhranikā, Sarvavasaṁkarī, Sarvaranjanikā, Sarvārthasādhikā, Sarvasampatprapūrinī, Sarvamantramayī and Sarvadvandakṣaṅkarī (S. T. 11).

The fourth categories belongs to the class of Kulotīrṇa Yoginis which includes ten names and suggest different attributes and capacities of the divine power of this class of godlings. Their names are Sarvasiddhipradā, Sarvasampatpradā, Sarvapriyaṅkarī, Sarvamaṅgalakārinī, Sarvakāmapradā, Sarvadukhavināśinī, Sarvamṛtupraśamanī, Sarvavighnanivārinī, Sarvāṅgasundarī and and Sarvasaubhāgyadāyini.

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

Their names suggest that these Yoginis are of good nature and bountiful to their devotees. The text however says that as they are always angry to those who are hostile to the gods, their face is full of rath and anger, their eye-brows, and face show the symptoms of anger (devadvsemabhikruddhaḥ bhrikute kuntilānanā). All have white complexion. (S. T. 12).

Nigarbha Yogini class include ten Yoginis in these categories. They are Sarvajñā, Sarvaśakti, Sarva-aiśvaryapradāyinī, Sarvajñānamayī, Sarvavyādhi vināśinī, Sarvādhārasvarūpā; Sarvapāpaharā, Sarvahanudamayī, Sarvarakṣāsvarūpinī and Sarvapsitāpradā. All these Yoginis have four hands and in them they show a thunderbolt (vajra), a spear (śakti), a tomara and a disc (chakra). Their colour is white. (S. T. 13).

Next category belongs to Rahasya Yoginis. This class includes the names of eight Yognis and seems to be related with the goddess Vāgeśvarī (the goddess of learning). They all have complexion like the red flower of Aśoka and wear armour (kavacha). In their two hands they show a lyre (vīṇā) and a book (pustaka). Their names are mentioned as Vaśinī, Kāmeśī, Modanī, Vimalā, Aruṇā, Jayanī, Sarveśī, Kaulinī. All these godlings have incarnated to kill the demons (daityasaṁhārahetavaḥ). (S. T. 14).

The eighth and the last category is of Atirahasya Yoginis. In this class there are only three Yoginis and all have eigth hands. In them they show a bow (chāpa), an arrow (bāṇa), a cup (pānapātra), a citras (mātulinga), a kind of sword (kṛpāṇa), the phalaka, the snake-noose (nāgapaśa), and a bell (ghantā). Their names are enumerated as Kāmeśī, Vajreśī and Bhagamālinī. They have red complexion like the sindura. (S. T. 15).

To this class of the Yoginis, we may consider the account about the Pīṭheśvarīes given in the Śrītattvanidhi. This account mentions seven pīthas known as Mūlādhāra, Svādhiṣṭhāna, Maṇipūraka, Anāhata, Viśuddha, Ānjñyā and Jālandhara presided by the goddess Śākinī, Kākinī, Lākinī, Rākinī, Dākinī. Hākini and Yākini respectively.

CC-0. Agamnigam Digital Presevation Foundation, Chandigarh

Śākinī is described as having five faces and three eyes. Her complexion is golden. In her hands she has a sickle (śriṇi), a lotus (kamala), a book (pustaka) and the fourth hand shows the pose of jñāna. (S. T. 36).

Fig. 34
Yoginī from Khajuraho

Kākinī has four faces (vedavaktrā) and three eyes. She wears the garments of yellow colour. In her two hands she holds a skull (kapāla) and shows the pose of abhaya. (S. T. 37).

Lākinī is of black colour. She has three faces and three eyes. She has a very fierce look. She is the source of energy and alleys fear to those who are her devotees. Her seat is amidst flesh and surrounded by the dāmaras. In one hand she holds a daṇḍa and by her other hand she shows the posture of abhaya. She is the cause of all comforts (sakalasukhakarī). (S. T. 38).

Rākinī is also of black complexion and has two faces. In her four hands she holds a ṭaṅka, a śūla, a kapāla and a damaru. She has fearful fangs and her abode is in the human blood. She drinks pure human blood. She is surrounded by Kālarātrī and other Yoginīs. Her colour is black. She fulfills all wishes of her devotees (abhimataphaladām). (S. T. 39).

Dākinī, the presiding deity of the Viśuddhapīṭha is the supreme Yoginī and the most ancient one. She is the most favourite attendant of Kālī.

The Gaṅgādhara inscription of Mālawā (423–424 A.D.)[24] mentions this goddess. This inscription particularly refers the shouting propensity of the goddess. As Ghoṣinī or Ghoṣā, Dākinī is mentioned in the Atharva Veda as the attendant of the terrific god Rudra.[25] In the Tantric texts she is described as the eater of raw flesh.[26]

According to the Śrītattvanidhi her complexion is red and has three eyes. In her four hands she holds a khaṭvāṅga, a kapāla, a trident (triśūla) and a big shield (mahācharma). Her abode is skin (tvaksthām). She grants abhaya to her devotees. (S. T. 40).

Hākinī is of white colour and has six faces and three eyes. She sits on a lotus throne. She has four hands but in the Texts, instead the four emblems such as damaru, kamala, akṣamālā and kapāla it is also stated that the goddess in one of the hands shows the jñānamudrā, probably as is common with various goddesses, particularly beloging to the Tantric goddess of Mahāyāna Buddhism. She holds also the rosary (akṣamālā) in which she shows the pose of the jñānamudrā. As she is described as haṃsagatyā she has her mount a goose. In this way the iconography of Hākinī seems to have derived much from Brahmāṇī. (S. T. 41).

Yākinī, the last Yoginī of this group, is a multi-colour goddess (sarvavarṇām samadṛṣtim). No specific number of her hands and emblems are described in the list. She is said to have all kinds of weapons and is further described as the bestower of all comforts (sakalasukhakarī). (S. T. 42).

In the Grahanidhi of the Śrītattvanidhi two forms of Kṛtyā are also described. One, as Kṛtyā and the other as Mahākṛtyā. Both are dire goddesses worshipped in the Tantra and Pañcharātra systems of upāsanā.

As Kṛtyā she is described at one place as holding a trident (triśulabhīṣaṇam hastā). But at the other place in the same description she is to have a daṇḍa, a ghaṇṭā, a sūrpa, a mārjanī, a pāśa and a kuṇḍikā, in her six hands. Her tongue and face is smeared with blood and wears the garland of skeleton (narasthimālā), the girdle of snakes (pannagamekhalā) and the kuṇḍala of kapālas. Her laugh is very fearful (prahasantim bhayānakam). She has loose and dishevelled hair and her large breasts hang downwards. Surrounded by the prabhāvalī of fire she rides over the shoulder of a man (adhirūḍhām naraskandham). She is of black colour. She is the destroyer of foes (ripunāśinīm). (Grahanidhi. 458).

Mahākṛtyā, as described in the Śabaratantra is of huge body and of black colour (kṛṣṇavarṇā). In her right hands she holds a sword (khaṅga) and a battle-axe (paraśu) and in the left hands she has a goad (aṅkuśa) and a mace (gadā). She is also the destroyer of the enemies (Grahanidhi, 459).

Fig. 35 Yoginī, Bheraghata

The Yoginī's are worshipped as folk deities in various communities all over the country. As guardian deities of villages also they are popular here and there. The Chausaṭha Yoginī temple at Bheraghata[27] at the confluence of Narmadā and Sarasvatī—a tributory of Narmadā itself, is very famous. The temple is of circular structure where the Yoginīs are imaged with label-inscriptions either in sitting or standing posture. They are all with four hands having various symbols or emblems in their hands. The temple is dated as 10th century A. D.[28]

The oblong temple of Khajuraho near Kandriya Mahadeva temple known as the Chausaṭha Yoginī temple has sixty four distinct cells, separated from each other by thick walls, pyramidal roofs. The images of the temple are gone or badly mutilated. A couple of Yoginī images housed in the local museum at Khajuraho may originally belonged to this temple. The images of this temple were also labelled with adequate inscriptions. The date of this temple has been a matter of controversy since long and range between 9th to 11th Century A. D. The latest writer on the problem L. K. Tripathi, with cogent reasons, has suggested the date of this temple as 11th century A.D.[29] To the same date we may place the temple of Yoginīs of Motavali.

In south India also there was a tradition of building the temple for Yoginīs. At Coimbatore there is a circular temple having sixty-four niches for the Yoginīs. But the precise date of the temple is not known.

Isolated images of the Yoginīs are also found. A few such images are in the Gwalior Museum from Naresar belonging to the date of thirteenth century A.D.[30] The earliest one belongs to Orissa, known as Chausaṭha Yoginī temple at Hirapur. According to K. N. Mahāpātra the date of the temple may be assigned to the eight or early ninth century A. D.[31] Hirapur, stands just near the Bhāgīrathī river near Bhuvaneśvara. The Yoginīs here are housed in a circular structure containing sixty niches having in them sixty-four Yoginīs. Mostly the images of the Yoginīs are carved here in the standing posture. They are not labelled but K. N. Mahāpātra has described their features in this account.[32] Another temple of Chausaṭha Yoginī is also found in Orissa at Ranipur Jharia. Here also are sixty four Yoginīs housed in a circular temple. But the Date of this temple is later than Hirapur. Here most of the Yoginīs are in the dancing pose and show four to six hands. There is much difference in the figure of the Yoginīs of this temple and in the Yoginī sculptures at Hirapur. The date of this temple is suggested by Charls Fabri near about 13th Century A. D.[33]

Yoginīs are made on the basis of their colours and the āyudhās. The first group of the Yoginīs hold in their hands a trident, a cattle-drum, a noose and a sword. The Yoginīs of the second category hold a rosary, a goad, a book and a vīṇā. The Yoginīs of the third group show in their hands the fire (jvālā), a spear, a club and the kunta. The fourth group of the Yoginīs have a sword, a shield, the paṭṭiśa and an axe. The Yoginīs of the fifth category hold in their hands the kunta, the kheṭa, the parigha and the bhinḍapāla.
